Two centuries before Henry IV of France had unfolded a somewhat similar idea of the Holy Alliance in the grand design, which is said to have been inspired by Queen Elizabeth. It set up a general council, or senate, modeled on the Amphictyonic Council of Greece, comprising 66 delegates from the different countries, whose duties were to settle disputes and keep the peace of Europe. Sully described the purpose of the grand design as intended "to deliver them forever from the fear of bloody catastrophies, so common in Europe; to secure for them an unalterable repose, so that all the princes might henceforth live together as brothers."

Mr. President, everyone knows that Henry IV was himself assassinated, and that Europe was convulsed with war for decades afterwards.

Quoting from the language of the Holy Alliance, the author says:

The present act has another object than to publish in the face of the whole world their fixed resolution, both in the administration of their respective States and in their political relations with every other Government, to take for their sole guide the precepts of that holy religion, namely, the precepts of justice, Christian charity, and peace.

Yet, in the various congresses which they held afterwards at Aix-la-Chapelle, at Verona, at Troppau, and at Laibach these sovereigns agreed, first, on the invasion of Spain and the crushing of the liberal movement there, and then to the holding down of Italy under the worst modern government that ever inflicted a people; a government whose attention to education was manifested by the fact that only two persons out of a hundred could read.

So, Mr. President, these empty forms of words get us nowhere at all. I for one am not willing to be driven by fear into any alliance with any nation. I am not willing to put our people in the attitude of being afraid of Great Britain and Japan, or of the whole world put together. Give our people a good cause to fight in, and they can defy, and will defy, every nation on earth.

Tell me what nation could attack us? Name it. Japan could not. Great Britain could not. France could not, and I hope would not, after what we have done for her. Germany could not. Russia can not, and never could. Of whom, then, are we afraid? Are the American people willing that their Senators should put them in the attitude of being afraid of England and Japan? I do not believe it for one minute. Let Senators who want to take that position take it, and then be responsible to their people for it. I believe it will be a serious responsibility for any Senator to put his people in that attitude. The American people are not afraid, and never were. When there were only 3,000,000 of them they defied the strongest empire in the world, and did it successfully.

Mr. President, we have been warned by one who claims to know that the military party of Japan never sleeps. We know that the military party of Great Britain never sleeps; and we ought to know that the military party of this country never sleeps. We are in as much danger from militarism as any other country in the world, and we are even now showing that we feel the necessity of curbing it.

Are we to become the accessories after the fact to the crimes which Japan has committed in Korea? Here is a book, just out, with an introduction by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], which I hope he will reread before he votes for this treaty. On page 8 of Senator SPENCER's "Foreword," he reminds the reader that under the Presidency of Chester A. Arthur, February 13, 1883, we made a treaty with Korea, one of whose clauses reads thus:

There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between the President of the United States and the King of Chosen, and the citizens and subjects of their respective Governments.

Now, mark:

If other powers deal unjustly or oppressively with either Government, the other will exert their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their friendly feelings.

There is our solemn honor pledged, and yet when the Korean delegation came to this peace conference and asked to be heard, they were denied the privilege and sent away unheard.

What is the situation in Korea?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator also should read the treaty between Japan and Korea dated February 3, 1904, which reads in part:

The Imperial Government of Japan definitely guarantees the independence and territorial integrity of the Korean Empire.

That was in 1904.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I thank the Senator. I had that in mind.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. As the Senator from Arizona with his timely and welcome interruption reminds me, Japan not only pledged herself to Korea but she pledged herself to Russia and Great Britain on the same line, and then broke those treaties shamelessly. Any nation which would commit a violation of solemn treaties as Japan has done, and then trample the life out of the country to whom her faith was pledged, is an utterly faithless country, and we would be foolish if we put any confidence in her.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we refuse to maintain diplomatic relations with Russia because it is alleged that the present Russian Government has repudiated the debts of the Imperial Russian Government. We refuse to treat with her, broadly, upon the ground that she does not keep the faith of nations. If we apply that rule to Russia, why should we not apply the same rule to a nation which breaks its treaties repeatedly, as Japan has?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the question is of the self-answering sort. I wish I had time to read of the atrocities which are being committed in Korea. They should shock the world. They murdered the Queen; they are murdering men, women, and children. They have committed massacres as bad as England committed in India when she indiscriminately shot down men, women, and children at Amritsar. She is holding Korea by methods which remind us of the worst horrors of medieval times. She is subjecting to torture systematically men, women, and children, committing upon Korean children, Korean girls, Korean women, outrages which make you shudder as you read of them.

I will read just one. If it were not typical, I would not read it. It is as follows:

Japanese soldiers attacked a young Korean who had shouted, "Independence!" and almost hacked him to pieces with swords, leaving him on the ground to die.

After this brutal attack on this unarmed and defenseless young man the officer ran away, leaving him in his terrible agony to expire in a few minutes. Some Koreans happening to pass by carried him to the nearest native hospital—Kuck Chai Hospital—but little could be done, so they placed him on a stretcher and started out for the Severance Union Medical College, still thinking that his life might be saved. While hurrying to the Severance Hospital they were stopped by a policeman from the Honmachi police station, who spoke to them in a threatening way and did all he could to prevent the case being taken to a foreign hospital. They remonstrated, saying that the case was so serious that a delay in taking the man to the Japanese hospital, which was some distance away, would surely result fatally. The Japanese are naturally anxious that such cases should not be seen by foreigners. On arriving at the Severance Hospital, medical examination revealed the fact that the man was already dead. It is impossible to say just when he died. His dead body presented the most pitiful appearance. Numbers of sword cuts had mutilated his head and hands. His clothing was saturated with blood—indeed, a sight never to be forgotten.

Their methods of torture as described in this book are hideous beyond words. One of the girls in a missionary station says just this:

I was led into a room. They dragged me on the floor; they struck me in the face; they struck me with their swords; they flung me into one corner of the room. At this point I must have been unconscious, as I do not remember what happened after that.

On recovering my senses I found myself in a room packed with young men and women. I saw some of them handled so brutally it almost broke my heart. After some time we were cross-examined. I was made to kneel down with my legs bound together, and each question and answer was accompanied alternately by blows in the face. They spat in my face, this with curses and invectives of the worst kind.

I was ordered to expose my breast. When I refused they tore my upper garments from me. They tied my fingers together and jerked them violently. I shut my eyes and dropped down to the floor. Thereupon, the examining officers uttered an angry roar and ordered me to kneel down as before, then rushed at me, seizing me by the breasts and shook me violently.

From page 87 of the same book I read the following description of the torture of political prisoners:

During the "preliminary examinations" unspeakable tortures are inflicted upon the prisoners, not by way of punishment after conviction but in order to extract evidence by which to convict, which means that the innocent are tortured equally with the guilty.

Men and boys were trussed and suspended from the ceilings so that their weight hung on the shoulders. Thus they were raised and lowered till unconscious. They had their fingers pressed over red-hot wires. Their naked flesh was lacerated with sharp hooks and seared with hot irons. Toenails were torn from the flesh with pincers. Men were placed in a tight box and then screwed up. They were tied up, their heads forced back, and hot water or a solution of water and red pepper poured down their nostrils. Slivers of wood were shoved far under their finger nails. They were flogged until they had to be taken to hospitals, where big slabs of gangrenous skin had to be cut off. In many cases they were flogged to death. And some kinds of tortures employed are unprintable. This was not done once or twice, but it was done repeatedly for days and nights, hours at a time, until the victim confessed, whether he had anything to confess or not. There are cases where men have said yes to anything, ignorant even of what they had admitted.

The book is full of just such outrages committed on native Christians.

Mr. President, I will stop, though I have not finished. We are leaving in the hands of Japan, and to the mercy of Japan, not only Korea but also huge slices of China, Manchuria, and part of Mongolia, to say nothing of Shantung with her 38,000,000 people. There are 17,000,000 of these Koreans. We are solemnly pledged to intervene in their behalf; but, instead of having done so, we refused to let them plead their own case at this tribunal, where brotherly love, justice, and eternal peace were to prevail.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I see that we are within five minutes of the time when we are to vote on this amendment. I did not intend to say anything further in debate on the pending treaty, but the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has asked me to say a word, and I will do so.

I want to say, first, that I do not agree with the statement of the Senator from Montana that it is within the terms of what is called international law that one nation shall respect the rights of another nation. Nations are sovereign in their capacity, with no limitations on their sovereignty until, by a contract made through treaties, they limit their own sovereignty. I think it is perfectly apparent, if we will only drift back into the past for a few years and review history itself, that we must realize that to respect the rights of other nations is not international law where it is not governed by treaty, or international law has been continually violated by the nations of the world—I may say by all the nations of the world which have had any power—from almost the beginning of history.

International law is that understanding of nations which is recognized by all. There is hardly a nation to-day which has had the power to invade another nation which has respected the rights of other nations. The dismemberment of the territory of Africa by the European powers in the last 15 years has failed to respect the rights of the original controllers of that territory, and even those nations in very recent years have met in solemn conclave to divide up the Mediterranean coast of Africa without one word ever being said to the effect that it was in violation of international law because they were not respecting the rights of the existing sovereigns of those countries.

The only way we obtain respect for our rights is either through the power of force or by international agreement. In this covenant we seek to have our rights respected by three great powers—the other signatory powers to this contract—and it is under this contract that we secure respect for those rights.

The Senator referred to those in charge of this treaty and then called me to my feet.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did that only because there was no one on the other side who is in charge of the treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is a compliment the Senator pays me. I was one of the delegates who signed the treaty, but my rights and powers in that respect ended when the treaty was handed to the President of the United States. I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, and have not regarded myself as one of those who controlled the situation here on the floor of the Senate in regard to these treaties. I made a speech the other day defining my attitude, but not in any sense with the idea that I am in control of the situation.

As to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I voted for the treaty of Versailles. Much of what the Senator proposes to provide in this amendment is in line with that treaty. If it could do no harm to the treaty, if I felt assured that if the amendment were in it it would be accepted by the other signatory powers, personally I would have no objection to it; but feeling, as I do, that it is of the utmost importance that this treaty shall be ratified, I can not consent to vote for an amendment, no matter how just I might think it is in the abstract, which might possibly bring about the rejection of the treaty by one of the other signatory powers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or prevent even further conversation on the subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have but a minute. I yielded to the Senator the other day.

Mr. ROBINSON. The time is up now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not intend to take the Senator off his feet, but I wanted to say that what I have said is not an attack on my part on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, but, from my viewpoint, I fear that if we put it into this contract we may endanger the contract, and I desire to secure its ratification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time for debate on the amendment has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] as modified.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of article 1:

Each of the high contracting parties will respect the rights and possessions of all other nations and refrain from all acts of aggression against any other power or powers. If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties and any other power or powers a controversy relating to said insular rights and possessions or to any far eastern question which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord subsisting between any party or parties to this compact and any other power or powers, the high contracting parties shall invite all powers claiming an interest in the controversy to a joint conference, to which the whole subject shall be referred for consideration and adjustment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I understand, however, that if present he would vote the same way that I intend to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is not present. I have been informed, however, that were he present he would vote the same way that I propose to vote. Therefore, I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES of New Mexico was called). The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], whose pair has just been announced by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], is unavoidably absent. If present, the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. I have been informed, however, that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH. I desire to say that my colleague, the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of sickness.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. Not being able to secure a transfer of that pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. I am unable to secure a transfer of that pair, and, as I find that Senator has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] on account of illness. Were he present, he would vote "nay."

I am also requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER]. Were he present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent by reason of serious illness in his family. His pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] has already been announced by that Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The absence of my colleague, the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], has already been announced, but I desire to state that if he were present he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 55, as follows:

So Mr. ROBINSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which is a modified form of the amendment which has just been voted on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of article 1 it is proposed to insert:

If there should arise between any of the high contracting parties and any other power or powers a controversy involving said insular rights and possessions threatening war which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, the high contracting parties shall invite all powers having an interest in the controversy to a joint conference, to which the whole subject shall be referred for consideration and adjustment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the amendment just tendered leaves out of the first sentence appearing in the so-called Robinson amendment which has just been voted on, the words "each of the high contracting parties will respect the rights and possessions of all the other nations and refrain from all acts of aggression against any other power or powers." The Robinson amendment further reads, "If there should develop between," while my amendment proposes to substitute the word "arise" for the word "develop." In the next line, instead of the words "relating to" the word "involving" is inserted, and in the sixth line the words "to any far eastern questions" are omitted and the words "threatening war" are inserted. Then there is excluded the langauge "and is likely to affect the harmonious accord subsisting between any party or parties to this compact and any other power or powers." The word "claiming," in line 10, is changed to "having," so that the amendment as now tendered reads:

If there should arise between any of the high contracting parties and any other power or powers a controversy involving said insular rights and possessions threatening war which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, the high contracting parties shall invite all powers having an interest in the controversy to a joint conference to which the whole subject shall be referred for consideration and adjustment.

It should be understood that if an aggression is directed against any one of the four signatory powers those four powers meet in conference, but under the treaty the outside party which is alleged to make the aggression is not admitted to the conference. On the other hand, as the treaty reads, if an outside party should threaten aggression against one of the four signatories a conference would be called, but if one of the four signatories should threaten war upon an outside party a conference would not be called.

Mr. President, I insist if it would be a good thing—and I am sure it would be a good thing—to assemble a conference if one of the signatory powers were threatened by an outside power, it would, for exactly the same reason, be a good thing to assemble a conference if one of the four signatory powers threatened war against an outside party. So far as we are concerned, what is the difference who is the aggressor in the war between China and Japan? Our interests are affected in exactly the same way. If there is a good reason for calling a conference should China threaten aggression against Japan, what reason can be assigned why there should not be a conference called if Japan should threaten aggression against China? Likewise, in any case why should not the outside party be invited to the conference? How can a dispute reasonably be settled by peaceful means unless the two contending parties are brought together in conference?

Up to the present time, Mr. President, I have heard no man urge a word against this argument. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has nothing whatever to urge against it, except that it might result in rejection of the treaty by some other nation. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama or the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Wisconsin, who want the treaty ratified just exactly as it stands, what one of the four signatory powers is likely to call in any outside party in case there is a conference, and what reason could any signatory party give for declining to agree to call in the outside party?

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator refers to me, I merely wish to say, without going into the merits of the amendment proposed by him, that its adoption would necessitate the rewriting of the treaty and returning it to another conference. It brings in new parties to the treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That may be a perfectly satisfactory answer to the Senator from Massachusetts, but it will hardly be satisfactory to the American people.

Mr. LODGE. We will risk that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course I would rather have the League of Nations than to have these treaties; I would infinitely prefer to have an agreement between all the nations of the earth, covering all controversies, rather than to have an agreement between some of the nations of the earth covering some controversies in one part of the globe.

I have sometimes felt, Mr. President, as though I sympathized with the idea that there ought to be no other people on the globe except Americans, but I have never discovered any legislative method, or any other method, of pushing the people of other nations off into infinite space. They are here, and we must somehow manage to live with them, and we ought somehow to manage to live with them in peace and not in war nor in quarrelsomeness. I have no sort of sympathy with the idea that because we can not have an agreement amongst all the civilized nations of the world to keep the peace everywhere, or at least to promise to keep it—whether we subsequently violate our promises or not—that therefore I ought to vote against a proposition to keep the peace in some small part of the world, among some few nations of the world in a restricted territory.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has spent a lot of his time in his highly logical and almost convincing manner in calling attention to what he thinks is a very serious defect in the particular treaty that we are now considering. He says that unless a nation is a party to this four-power treaty it can not be invited, and will not be invited, to sit at the board in order to discuss the possible adjustment of the controversy which may have arisen.

There are two objections to his argument, made in his strong, demonstrative, logical way. By the way—although it amounts to nothing, being merely my own private opinion—I am of the opinion that there is not a Member of this body on either side of this aisle better equipped, with an unvarying logical faculty than the Senator from Montana. If his premises are once granted, he drives on without wavering to his conclusion; but, unfortunately, now and then he is not as careful about his premises as he is about his conclusions and about his logical processes.

In the first place, I can not imagine the United States sitting down to a board when it had a quarrel with any other nation without inviting that other nation to sit down at the same board. I ask him can you? The Senator remains quiet, from which I infer that his imagination can not stretch any further than mine does upon that subject.

The other three parties to this treaty are Japan and France and Great Britain. By the way, it is a great pity that Great Britain is a party to it, because, if she were not, all the German-American and Irish-American opposition to it would have ceased long ago. It is a pity that Great Britain exists. It is a pity that she and her law and her language and her literature and her civilization and her commerce can not be flung out into the infinite ether and gotten rid of somehow. That would satisfy certain extreme elements in the United States who want no further justification for any position they happen to take than hatred of England.

But, Mr. President, the other three parties to this treaty are France, Japan, and Great Britain, the last country unfortunately speaking our language, loving our literature, originating our law, inspiring our commerce, but still unfortunately tabooed in German-American and Irish-American circles. All three of these nations—France, Japan, and Great Britain—have signed the treaty of Versailles with the League of Nations covenant as a part of it, and under at least two clauses of the League of Nations covenant they are compelled, whenever they have a controversy with any other member of the league—and there are some 40 other members besides them—to make their complaint to the league, and to have the league summon the nations in controversy into common council for an adjustment. Not only that but they are compelled, when they have a controversy with a nonmember, to agree to leave it to the League of Nations.

Mr. President, so much for the attitude of France, Japan, and Great Britain. The Senator's entire argument was based upon the idea that if these three powers entered into this treaty it set aside the League of Nations and their covenant with the other 40 members of the League of Nations. I believe since then the number has grown to fifty-odd; I am not quite sure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me correct the Senator. I insisted that this was entirely consistent with the League of Nations. I made that argument.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, the Senator insisted that it was entirely consistent with the covenant, and the friends of the covenant have confessed that it is. The strongest advocates of the League of Nations in Great Britain—Mr. Balfour, Lord Curzon, Winston Churchill, and the balance of them—have said that there is not a word in this treaty that conflicts with the League of Nations, and yet I have heard it in the cloakroom, yesterday and day before and to-day, argued in my ear that this was a movement to "scuttle the League of Nations"; and the Senator's argument proceeded on the idea that these three great powers, being once bound by this treaty, were freed of their obligation to the League of Nations treaty, which obligates them to summon their adversaries in council.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On the contrary, I insisted this afternoon that they could do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah! The Senator insisted that they could, but he argued that maybe they might not, and he went on to say, "Suppose Japan objected?" Now, suppose Japan did object to calling her adversary into conference around the board, then that would prevent any unanimous agreement under this treaty but it would not prevent action under the League of Nations covenant; and everybody that signed the League of Nations covenant, including Japan, agreed that they would file any treaty that they ever made with anybody else in the secretariat of the League of Nations, and the League of Nations will pass upon the question as to whether this treaty is in conflict with the covenant of the League of Nations or not; and there is not a man here, including the Senator from Montana, who will even pretend that the League of Nations will declare that these treaties are in conflict with the League of Nations. Silence is consent once more.

Mr. President, I am a Democrat, a Bourbon Democrat, a plain, blamed-fool Mississippi Democrat. I have no patience with Republicanism and I have no patience with partisanship in connection with international affairs. If a Republican President had sent the Versailles treaty to this body three-fourths of you Republicans would have voted for it, including the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If Mr. Wilson had sent these treaties to this body two-thirds of you Democrats would have voted for it, including the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and, of course, my poor little humble self.

Now, my friends, if I have a right to call you by that name—I am forbidden by the rules to call you "gentlemen"; this is the only body in the world where you can not call your fellow Members "gentlemen"; you must call them "Senators," and nothing else—but, just between us, is it not about time that we stopped partisanship at the coast line? A distinguished Republican nods his head in acquiescence, and yet I remember when he did not stop partisanship at the coast line. I remember when he ought to have done it. I remember having a private conversation with him rather suggesting that idea and receiving very little response. Now, when I am merely talking to this side I receive not much more response—not a much more cordial response, at any rate.

Mr. President, "the United States" is not singular, as this Brandegee amendment names it—"the United States is of the opinion." I thought "the United States" was e pluribus unum, and therefore plural. In so far as the United States are mentioned in the Constitution of the United States they are plural as much as the United Provinces of Holland or The Netherlands are plural.

I can not conceive how the United States can be anything except the several States composing the United States, and therefore plural. There was a quarrel yesterday about part of the grammar of this so-called Brandegee resolution. I beg pardon; I said "so called"; I believe it is actually the Brandegee resolution, and not so called at all; but it was accepted by the President of the United States. He was not bullied into it—no! He was not scared into it—no! He was not frightened about it—no! He just accepted it because he did not care. He had made an arrangement with foreign powers, and instead of abiding by the gentlemen's contract, as the Senator from Alabama does, he thought maybe he had a right to change it. It never occurred to him that maybe these people might say: "Here is the thing that I agreed on with you. Now that you have changed it, I will consider it over again, and see whether I can agree on it now."

Mr. President, I am a little tired of one situation under our constitutional Government, although I worship the Constitution. I am tired of an international situation under which one man over one-third in this body—not representative of the people, but representative solely of the States—can defeat any international agreement into which the United States has proposed to enter. I think the next amendment after the three supernumeraries you had better add to the Constitution would be one substituting for two-thirds of the Senate as the colleague of the President to ratify a treaty a "majority of the two Houses in joint Congress assembled."

I am tired of allowing one over one-third to make us the laughing stock of the civilized association of nations. No matter with what overwhelming majority views this Government and its constituencies may enter into an agreement with any other power on the surface of this earth, one man over one-third of this august body, called by itself "august," can defeat it.

Talk about autocracy! Talk about minority rule! Talk about overcoming and overstepping the will of the majority! Our Constitution enables a minority of one over one-third in the Senate to do whatever it pleases in all our international agreements. Unfortunately you can not get rid of the other nations except by exterminating them, killing them, or pushing them off the globe, and no legislative method has ever been invented for doing that. They are there—Turks, Chinese, Japanese, French, Italians, Greeks, Rumanians, Czechoslovakians, Yugoslavians, and even the British—even the British, poor old Scotch and English and Welsh from whom about three-fourths of us are derived altogether or partially, because I take it that 75 per cent of the people of the United States, though they may have German or Irish blood in their veins, have also English, Scotch, or Welsh blood in the same veins. Some few of them have nothing else; and, you know, I have been ass enough to pride myself upon that fact, as far as I am concerned individually; but even those that are of mixed blood have some English or some Scotch or some Welsh. But I am awfully sorry that there is not any way of pushing Great Britain, including King George and Lavid Lloyd-George and Sir Arthur Balfour, and all these other fellows, into the middle of the Atlantic or Pacific and sinking them, so that we could have an Irish peace somewhere—an Irish peace somewhere—as far as English, Scotch, and Welsh, being then all drowned, are concerned.

I doubt even then whether north Ireland and south Ireland would not be fighting one another—or the Free State fighting Valera. Maybe God could keep them at peace with one another. Even the Pope can not. We would have this Irish peace in the middle of the Pacific or Atlantic if we sunk all the English, Scotch, and Welsh there, or in the middle of the Atlantic if we sunk them there, and it would be so nice to sink Shakespeare and Chaucer and Tennyson and Byron and Bobbie Burns and Lord Bacon and Huxley and Tyndall and Darwin and the Duke of Wellington.

Mr. ASHURST. He was born in Ireland.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the way, I do not believe they would sink him, because he lived in Ireland a little while once, and so they claim even him as an Irishman now, though they denounce him as an Irish oppressor in the next breath. Even you, as the august President of this august body, can not push all the British off the globe. If you pushed them off, they would get into the sea, and if you once pushed them into the sea they would be used to it. They have been used to it ever since King Alfred's time, and have been supreme there up to very recently, when they have voluntarily agreed that they will let us be supreme.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator ought not to omit Newton and John Milton.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am just reminded by the Senator from Montana that I ought not to have forgotten John Milton and Isaac Newton; but I am so absolutely Americanly patriotic, armed with a desire not for the freedom of the Philippines but for the freedom of Ireland, that I would unhesitatingly push Sir Isaac Newton and John Milton plumb off the boards if I knew how.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not forget George Harvey.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think he is a hybrid. Mr. President, I decline to be diverted from the great sublime heights to which my oratory has just a moment ago risen to the low level of the contemplation of George Harvey or other mouse nests that may exist somewhere upon the surface of the globe. Notwithstanding the prevailing influence which the Senator from Arizona is entitled to have with me, I decline to have my sublimity of thought brought down to George Harvey. I would not mind it if one of the pages were mentioned by name, but I do not want to fool with George Harvey while I am in earnest about a great international question.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, the Senator may not be fooling with him, but he is agreeing with him mighty beautifully.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I may possibly agree with a Mohammedan now and then; for example, when he says that "there is but one God"; but that does not argue that I am a Mohammedan, and it does not argue that I take in all the balance of his doctrines, including his harem proclivities. I might agree with George Harvey about something. I suspect he and I both speak English, and I agree with him about that in a way. By the way, he speaks pretty good English, too. I do not think I can be mixed up or identified with George Harvey simply because I agree with him about some one thing. I might agree with some Senator about being a member of that great English church which "never interferes with a man's politics or religion," and I might disagree with him about a great many other things, and could not on that account alone be identified with him. I could not be taken as his synonym, and I absolutely resent, in spite of the friendship between the Senator from Kentucky and me—a long-existing and deep-felt friendship—his attempt to identify me with George Harvey.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I do trust that he will not take it that seriously. My friendship for the Senator from Mississippi dates back 20 years, a long and delightful friendship, and even to find him in the same dirty nest with Harvey, preaching the same political heresy, and engaging in the same nauseous adulation of Britain, will not lessen my love, hardly my respect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if there is anything in the world that I would welcome, it is that confession of personal devotion, antagonistic to all of the expressed and foolish convictions of the Senator from Kentucky. I really do not think that George Harvey had much to do with this. In fact, I sometimes doubt whether any of us have much to do with what is going on in the world. I sometimes think that most of us are sort of like George Harvey; we are flies on the spokes of a wheel, and the wheel is going forward in God's good wisdom, and now and then we imagine that we are moving the spokes and making the wheel move; but whatever else may happen, when the gentleman comes to insult me next, I hope he will call my attention to some community of opinion between me and my favorite nigger mammy, but leave George Harvey out. I do not care about him particularly.

I have been a little bit diverted from the serious side of this question, but before I sit down I want to say just one more word. If there be anything in the world which I treasure most highly, it is the peace of the world. There is only one thing I can call to mind now that I treasure more highly than that, and that is the preservation of the race to which I belong, the great white race.

I believe, to use the language of Mr. Jefferson, my apostle of democracy whether he is anybody else's or not, in what he so nicely called "the philosophy of Jesus," although he was himself in conviction a Unitarian. I believe with him that the only thing in the world that can drag this world out of its present chaotic condition is "the philosophy of Jesus," the Prince of Peace, the Apostle of Love amongst men. As far as I am concerned, I have no patience with men who choose to cultivate animosities amongst men rather than to dwell upon their common points and the reasons why they can and ought to love one another and help one another on this miserable little planet, one amongst thousands of planets in a solar system amongst thousands of solar systems, each one of us nothing but one little ant in a heap of ants, and most of us inclined now and then to translate our opinion into a conviction and to worship that as a god. I know nothing that to my mind is more worthy of human devotion and human love than the love of peace itself, and I believe that these treaties tend in that direction.

I shall vote against the Brandegee reservation, although the President was weak-backboned enough to accept it, and although the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations accepted it, because I think it half emasculates the treaty. But there is still, in my opinion, enough virility left in it to engender some good things for the world, and amongst the good things some peace in one part of the world amongst some of the nations of the world. Would to God that it went further, as the League of Nations contemplated going when a partisan majority in this body defeated its announced purpose and the will of Jesus Christ.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] have interested and amused the Senate and the galleries. The Senator from Mississippi is always entertaining; he is usually logical when he speaks, and forceful when he attempts to be. There is no quarrel between the Senator from Mississippi and those of us who think that this treaty in the form in which it is presented is not calculated to conserve the peace of the world, but is rather calculated, in the remote if not the immediate future, to involve this Nation in serious controversies which, by the exercise of grave wisdom now, the Senate and the Nation might avoid.

The Senator from Mississippi has declared that he is a good Democrat. No one doubts that.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi should not put his friends in this Chamber, as I think he attempted to do, impliedly, in the attitude of opposing this treaty or of suggesting amendments to it from political motives or purposes. The Senator from Mississippi is a great debater. He speaks just as fluently when he is familiar with the issues in debate as when he is unacquainted with them, and no more so. His remarks a few moments ago demonstrate that fact conclusively to those of us who heard the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] discuss the amendment which the Senate recently rejected.

Unintentionally he misquoted the Senator from Montana in two or more particulars. The Senator from Mississippi did not design to be unfair. He could not intentionally be unfair if he tried to. His difficulty arose out of the fact that he was not in attendance during the course of the debate, and he did not hear the issues involved in that amendment presented by the Senator from Montana.

Neither the Senator from Mississippi nor any other Senator can divert this body from its duty at this time to treat this subject as a matter of the gravest importance. It is no answer to the provisions of the amendment, and to the argument submitted in its behalf, to say that the opposition to this treaty rises out of an element of citizenship pro-German and pro-Irish, unfriendly to the British people, and that there is a disposition among Senators who are responsive to the influences of those political elements to destroy Great Britain and all the other nationalities in the world which have not incurred the kindly feeling and friendship of Ireland.

Mr. President, the issue is far more profound than the Senator from Mississippi has stated it. If I chose to debate the subject upon the level he occupied, I might say that while there may be some Senators who look with suspicion upon this treaty because it originated in the brains of British statesmen, there are also others who, by their records in this body, have indicated such an opposition or antagonism to the aspirations of the great people of Ireland, struggling throughout the centuries for liberty, which happily now is almost in sight, that those Senators might be induced to look with suspicion upon any opposition which is countenanced or supported by the citizens of this country who are of the Irish stock.

Mr. President, the issue is more important. It is far more consequential. I am not conscious of any other motive, nor do I believe that my colleagues who take the view of this matter which I assert are conscious of any other motive than a desire to safeguard the interests of the United States and the welfare of the citizens of this Republic, whatever may be their descent. There may be Senators who are so responsive to British influences that suggestions from Mr. Balfour or other great British statesmen prompt them to immediate indorsement. I do not make that charge. I make the declaration that in the consideration of this treaty Senators should be governed by their conscientious conception of their duty to this Government and its people.

I do not challenge the motive, the integrity, or the sincerity of my friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who occupies the opposite side of this question, nor do I challenge the integrity of other Senators who take the view of the subject which he presents; but I demand, as a representative in this body of a sovereign State, that if my colleagues expect to retain my confidence they accord to me the same sincerity of purpose which I concede to them.

I have not forgotten that when the treaty of Versailles was under consideration the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations investigated the secret and confidential transactions relating to the negotiation of that treaty. Witness after witness was called and the testimony was reduced to writing and is recorded in a volume which I hold in my hand, containing 1,297 pages.

I have not forgotten that when the four-power treaty was sent to the Senate the Committee on Foreign Relations refused to make any investigation of the subject and refused to inquire into the motives underlying the treaty, and reported it without information. While the Versailles treaty was under consideration the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, was called before the Foreign Relations Committee and cross-examined indefinitely. When the four-power treaty was pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, went to Bermuda for a vacation. No information whatever was furnished the Senate or the Committee on Foreign Relations respecting the negotiation of this treaty.

In addition to the fact that those who were in authority in the State Department were examined when the Versailles treaty was pending, the President of the United States was called upon for information. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I visited the White House, in company with the other members of that committee, and President Wilson subjected himself to cross-examination. He answered every question that was asked him; but in this case, for some reason, all information has been denied the Senate as to the secret negotiations which brought forth this instrument.

Mr. President, Secretary of State Hughes is a great man and an able lawyer, but there stand out prominently in recent history two great mistakes which Secretary Hughes made. Senators will recall that when the last national election was imminent, he, with 31 other eminent Republicans, signed a letter, which was published broadcast throughout the United States, declaring that he favored the League of Nations, and that the way to get the United States into the League of Nations was to elect President Harding. I could not understand at that time the mental processes by which Mr. Hughes arrived at the conclusion that the way to promote the league was to elect to the Presidency a man who said he was opposed to it. Nevertheless when the elections had passed Mr. Hughes was found to be very gravely mistaken respecting Mr. Harding's attitude. Mr. Hughes has never offered any explanation for his own change of mind, if he has changed.

Mr. Hughes made another grave mistake, apparently, in connection with the cost of our army of occupation. In the Versailles treaty it is provided that the expenses of the armies of occupation shall constitute a claim prior to reparations. An expense of $241,000,000 has been incurred by the United States in that behalf, and now we find that Great Britain, France, and other parties to the Versailles treaty are contending that since we are not parties to that treaty we can not demand or receive the benefits of its provisions. They claim they are not bound by the provisions of the separate peace made between the United States and Germany.

So by his failure to safeguard by proper language in some instrument or agreement or by proper proceedings the prior claim of the United States for the expenses incurred by the army of occupation we stand in danger of losing $241,000,000. Now, we are told that so great is his wisdom and so responsible his word that we should take without question his conclusions as to the true interpretation and application of this proposed treaty. Mr. Hughes tells us that he made the first draft after consent had been secured for France to become a party to the four-power pact. He tells us that with Japan and the United States objecting to the inclusion of the main islands of Japan in the four-power treaty, they were included, and that afterwards it became necessary to report a supplementary treaty to exclude them; that is, to interpret the four-power pact as meaning that the main islands of Japan were not included in the treaty.

Mr. President, why are we not furnished with the information as to why the main islands of Japan were originally included in the four-power pact? The friends of the treaty here say that there is nothing material about the matter; that they might just as well have been in as out or have been out as in; but Mr. Hughes tells us that the main islands were taken out of the treaty in response to a sentiment among the people of the United States and the people of Japan who opposed their inclusion. It would be interesting to the Senate and to the people of the United States to know the history of the negotiation of this treaty; and to know who suggested it, who prompted it, who inspired it.

We are told that the treaty relieves us from the Anglo-Japanese alliance. That is the one accomplishment of which its advocates boast. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has shown that there is nothing of value in that contention, if it be true. Now, we are presenting to the Senate an amendment which will give to any nation assailed by any one of the four powers the privilege of sitting in a conference for the settlement of that dispute. Not a word of argument is offered by Senators why the amendment which was recently defeated should not have been accepted. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] comes into the Chamber and undertakes to ridicule this important provision out of the Senate. He can not do that. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana ought to be agreed to, because it accords to China and Russia and to any other nation which may have a dispute with one of the four powers party to this agreement the right to come into conference and be heard. If that right be refused, we shall make little progress toward peace by the ratification of this treaty.

Why does not some Senator who has voted against my amendment give some reason for doing so? The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said that he was in hearty accord with the principle of the amendment; that personally he believes it ought to go into the treaty; but he is afraid that one of the three powers will reject the treaty if we agree to amendment. Does not that, then, put the Senator from Alabama on notice that if any one of these powers objects to this amendment that power intends to do the very thing which the amendment seeks to prevent? If he fears rejection by a power unwilling to be restrained from aggression, then should he not, in the discharge of his duty as a Senator of the United States, vote to protect this Government from entering into a combination which will permit the four powers forming it to make aggressions against other nations now friendly to the United States?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I regret to see so accomplished a statesman, so ready a debator, so learned a legislator as the erudite Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] devote his superb talents to so mean a purpose as the gratuitous, unprovoked, unwarranted assault upon a great and patriotic body of American citizens simply because they happen to belong to a race which, in some mysterious way, has incurred his hostility. I refer the learned Senator from Mississippi to the wise aphorism of Edmund Burke, who did not know "the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people." God pity and God help the man who, with a knowledge of their history, with all its proud, its pathetic, and its tender memories, can frame an indictment against the Irish people.

I, like the Senator from Mississippi, have not a drop of Irish blood in my veins. I wish I had. I, like the Senator from Mississippi, can trace my ancestry for some centuries in an unbroken English line. I am not bound to or prejudiced in favor of the Irish race by any tie of creed or kin or clan, but I do know that when the history of all the peoples of all the world shall have been written, there will be nothing in song or story sweeter or sadder or grander than the sufferings and, thank God, at last, the triumph of the Irish people and the Irish nation.

Out of centuries of persecution such as no other race ever suffered, up from fields incarnadined in the blood of heroes, from stakes and gibbets, sanctified by the sacrificial death of martyrs, in her rags and her poverty, her learning and heroism, wild and grand and beautiful, Ireland rises like a transfiguration to command the admiration of the world, for at last, thank God, in spite of the irony of JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS and the power and the oppression of all England old Ireland is free.

Mr. President, it might be well if we are to follow the advice of the learned and cynical Senator from Mississippi, to go to Quebec and efface from the eternal rock the last vestige of the blood of Richard Montgomery, because he was an Irishman and hated the English when he fell pierced by cannon balls upon the heights of Abraham, and go to the front of the White House and tear down the inspiring equestrian figure of Andrew Jackson, because Old Hickory hated the same English when he hurled Pakenham and his red hosts into the sea, and erect, if you will, instead some fitting tribute to Lloyd-George or George Harvey or the learned Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CARAWAY. And may I suggest to the Senator, while we are doing that, we might erect a monument to Gen. Ross and Admiral Cockburn for their great exploit in burning the Capitol and the White House?

Mr. STANLEY. Exactly. Why should not Ireland feel an antipathy to Great Britain? What right has the senior Senator from Mississippi to treat contemptuously her just resentment against wrongs so deep and damnable that their reiteration might make the very angels in heaven weep and of the sinews of childhood thews of steel?

Were I an Irishman, as I am an American of English ancestry, I would swear my first-born son, as Hamilcar did Hannibal to the eternal hate for Rome, to the abhorrence of all that Englishmen say or do or think as long as he remembers the women they had outraged, the babes they had butchered, her sons sent to the stake and the gibbet, her faith dishonored, and her fields drenched with blood and desolated by fire and sword.

From Ireland her sons have come to America. They have filled every post of honor; and they have nothing touched that they have not adorned; and, as an American, as a Democrat, as a patriot, I take this occasion at this hour to pay my poor but humble meed of praise to the brainpan of the world, to the home of poetry, of eloquence, and of valor—to the Emerald Isle.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to article 1.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire to advert to the answer made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to my inquiry for a reason for opposing this amendment now under consideration. The Senator said it would mean the reassembling of the conference. I recall very distinctly when the Versailles treaty was under consideration, and the Senator had offered some 23 amendments or reservations, I put the identical question to him, whether the adoption of those reservations would not mean the reassembling of the Versailles conference. In his customary manner he dismissed the question as unworthy of consideration and said that all of the other nations would be perfectly delighted to get us in with the reservations. I inquire of him now whether the other three nations, parties to the pending treaty, would not be perfectly delighted to get us into this agreement with the amendment now offered without reassembling the conference?

Mr. President, I now desire to make an observation in relation to some remarks made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] concerning my attitude. The Senator from Mississippi, as has been remarked, could not have been present when I addressed myself to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], in the course of which I said that, in my view, there is nothing inconsistent between this treaty and the League of Nations. The Senator from Mississippi assumed, apparently, that I had taken the contrary position, and chose to attribute my desire to see the pending treaty amended to an overenthusiasm in favor of the League of Nations or to partisan considerations. I repeat, Mr. President, that, according to my mind, there is nothing whatever inconsistent between the treaty before us, either in its present form or as it would be if it were amended by the pending amendment or by the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, and the League of Nations. The covenant of the League of Nations contemplates that whenever differences arise between any of the members thereof or between a member and some outside party, the parties to the controversy will endeavor to adjust their differences through diplomatic negotiations or by consultation with and the assistance of friendly nations or otherwise, but that if they are unable to do so, then either party may cite the other before the council of the league, and there the matter will be disposed of as provided in the covenant. The pending treaty contemplates merely that the four powers, if a difference should arise between any two or more of them, shall assemble and adjust the difference if they can, or, if the difference should arise with an outside party, that they will endeavor to arrange in some way or other to dispose of that difference. If, however, that proceeding is unsuccessful, then any of the parties involved may institute a further proceeding before the council of the League of Nations and have the matter disposed of there. So it seems to me no one need be in the least alarmed that the amendment which is pending would in any wise militate against the operation or defeat the growth of the League of Nations.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator will remember that there was no reservation offered to the provision of the League of Nations providing for arbitrations, calling in outside parties, and allowing any party to participate, and, therefore, any Senator who voted for the Versailles treaty, with reservations or without reservations, voted for those provisions.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right. No reservation and no amendment was tendered to article 11, which contemplates gathering together the parties to a controversy, whether they were members of the league or not, in the endeavor to adjust the differences which might arise between them.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I gathered from the statement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that he felt that the argument of the Senator from Montana to the effect that China or Russia in the event of a controversy in which they were involved might be left out of consideration was minimized by reason of the fact that, under the covenant of the League of Nations, Japan and England and France, who are members of the league, would be compelled to call either China or Russia before the council of the League of Nations, and in that forum those countries would have the right to present their cause; but it seems to me that he forgot that we are not members of the League of Nations, and that we would not have an opportunity to be present at the conference which would thus take place, while under this treaty we are compelled to be present at any conference which takes place under the provisions of the four-power pact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right about that.

Mr. PITTMAN. In other words, we are compelled to meet with Great Britain, France, and Japan, but the nations thus conferring are not compelled to have at their meeting either China or Russia or any other country with which a controversy may arise; we must sit in that conference with them out; and if subsequently, after the matter has developed, perhaps after war has occurred, the question is taken before the council of the League of Nations, we can have no voice in the determination which may be arrived at there.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right; and I also understood the Senator from Mississippi further to contend that under the covenant of the League of Nations to which the three powers are signatories it was obligatory upon them to cite in the outside party; but that is not correct. The outside party may be cited before the council of the league; but there is no obligation upon anybody, by reason of the covenant of the League of Nations, to call the outside party into the conference contemplated by this treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add, at the end of article 1, the following:

If there should arise between any of the high contracting parties and any other power or powers a controversy involving said insular rights and possessions threatening war which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, the high contracting parties shall invite all powers having an interest in the controversy to a joint conference to which the whole subject shall be referred for consideration and adjustment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana and Mr. ROBINSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. CULBERSON's name was called). My colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] voted?

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am about to ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business, so that I can present the conference report on the second deficiency appropriation bill.

I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed its legislative session.

Mr. WARREN. I present the conference report on the second deficiency bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10663) "making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 9, 15, 22, 23, 24, 29, 31, 34, 39, 40, 42, 43, 44, 48, 51, 52, and 53.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 25, 28, 30, 32, 33, 35, 36, 38, 41, 45, 47, 49, 50, 53, 54, 56, 58, 61, 62, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, and 76; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"BRIDGES.

"For repairs and improvements to the Calvert Street Bridge, $26,000: Provided, That one-half of any amount expended from this appropriation shall be borne by the street railway company or companies using said bridge and the amount thus collected shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and to the credit of the District of Columbia in the same proportions as this appropriation is paid from the Treasury of the United States and the revenues of the District of Columbia."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"PATENT OFFICE.

"For carrying into effect the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes,' approved February 18, 1922, $158,926.39, and in addition thereto the unexpended balance of the appropriation for salaries in the Patent Office for the fiscal year 1922 is made available for the payment of the salaries authorized in said act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment, insert "$1,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 59: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment, insert "$36,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 64: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "The appropriation for 'Pay, and so forth, of the Army, 1922,' shall be available to pay the expenses incurred prior to January 1, 1922, incident to carrying into effect the provisions of the act entitled 'An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish free transportation and subsistence from Europe and Siberia to the United States for certain destitute discharged soldiers and their wives and children,' approved June 30, 1921," and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon amendments numbered 26, 27, and 60.

F. E. WARREN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
CARTER GLASS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
MARTIN B. MADDEN,
J. G. CANNON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask what the three amendments are that are still in disagreement?

Mr. WARREN. I will tell the Senator. Two of the items, amendments numbered 26 and 27, are as to the officials of the General Accounting Office. They are two amendments carrying amounts put in by the Senate, as requested, because of the transfer of the accounting in the Veterans' Bureau directly to the General Accounting Office.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What was the objection? Is the difference in the conference based upon the merits of the amendment or upon a point of order against it?

Mr. WARREN. There was no point of order. It is on the merits. One of them is an appropriation of about $110,000 for additional employees in that department from now until July. The other one is an appropriation of $300,000 for the same purpose through the following year because of the transfer having been made after the regular 1923 bill had passed. The third item has to go back for adoption by the House. It is one of those things which, under the House rules, they deem legislation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is what I was inquiring into, as to whether or not it was subject to that point of order and consequently had to be submitted to a vote of the House.

Mr. WARREN. They on the other side have adopted a rule which, so far, we have allowed them to impose upon us, that if we put in matter that is against the House rules—of course it was not against our rules—they must take it back for a vote. It can not go out on a point of order, but they simply take it back for a vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I shall not delay the Senator for more than a moment. What is the view of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee as to the future arrangements between the two Houses in regard to that practice of making a point of order, in effect, in the House of Representatives against an amendment put on a bill in the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. No point of order can be made in the House now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I mean a point of order to this extent, that the conferees are deprived of power to agree upon it. It must go to the House itself for a vote in the House, so that we are deprived of a conference on that.

Mr. WARREN. No; it goes to the conference, and then if they take it back it can go before the House; but it is generally agreed to in conference all right, subject to the bare matter of a vote of the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But that is not a conference.

Mr. WARREN. In that aspect, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There must be a vote of the House, of course.

Mr. WARREN. We are not speaking of that. It is not the vote of the House on the conference report.

Mr. LODGE. It is a point of order on the Senate amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is a vote of the House upon the amendment itself. It takes it out of the hands of the conferees. Of course the Appropriations Committee are confronted with that more than anyone else, and if they feel that they can get along with that system I suppose we can, but it is not a conference. It is, in effect, a denial of a full and free conference between the two Houses as to all those matters that they consider legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is right about it technically. This question came up before we would go into the first conference after the House adopted that rule; but the then chairman, Mr. Good, stated that there was not an item in the bill but that he would be able to see through, because he had already taken it up with the House, and he begged us for the time being to conform to that rule on the ground that it would cause us no inconvenience; and so far, rather than make the open break, we have gotten along very nicely with it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was just asking, in good faith, for the experience of the committee on that subject.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will let me finish, I have said to the House Members that the time would soon come when we probably should have to do away with it, since we have lately changed our own rules. The time will come, of course, when there must be some change. In one sense it is not a real conference; but it comes this near it: In the conference we make the House conferees state whether they will take it up and agree to recommend such items to their House, and so far there never has been an item sent back that the conferees have agreed to recommend.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator what became of the item of a deficiency appropriation for the Immigration Service?

Mr. WARREN. I regret to say that after two hours and a half of discussion we were obliged to recede; and I will say that our contention failed, perhaps more than anything else, because the department had seen fit not to recommend the amount that we had presented in the bill. In other words, there had been no estimate made through the Budget or directly until the matter had already gotten into the bill through amendment, and it had not even then been received. I will say that the House hearings show that there was no call from the Department of Labor for that appropriation before either the Senate or the House, and what made it rather worse was that when the amendment was offered on the floor on the House side and reported this morning the votes were all against it except one.

Mr. LODGE. I did not suppose it possible to cause any change in the decision after the action of the House, but I think this further crippling of the Immigration Service is a very serious matter. It will undoubtedly lead to a great deal of smuggling both on the west coast and the east coast and also over the Canadian line.

Mr. WARREN. It will probably result in the furloughing of a great many of the immigration officers.

Mr. LODGE. It will mean the furloughing of from four to seven hundred, because there will be no money to pay them until the 1st of July. It is estimated that it will probably lead to about 10,000 illicit, unlawful immigrants being admitted, because there will be no immigrant inspectors to maintain the stations or carry on the service. This has been done by the House. They have prevented the appropriation, because we put it in in the Senate. It seems to me not economy but extravagance of the worst kind to break up a service which at the best is undermanned, and take from a total force of 1,200 men from four to seven hundred, and have that number on furlough all the time. I do not intend to make any further objection.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the adoption of the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate further insist upon the amendments in disagreement, request a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

DISABLED VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR.

Mr. POMERENE. I move to discharge the Judiciary Committee from the further consideration of the bill (S. 406) to incorporate the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, and also the bill (H. R. 216) to incorporate the Disabled American Veterans of the World War. I understand that under the rule the motion will go over until a subsequent time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will go over under the rule.

REVENUES AND EXPENSES OF RAILROADS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on yesterday, as shown on page 3775 of the RECORD, on motion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], volumes 3 and 4 of the testimony taken before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate were ordered to be printed as a Senate document. There are some illustrations in that testimony, and I am advised that the Printing Office has no power to print the illustrations unless the Senate so orders.

Mr. LODGE. I think that question will have to go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ASHURST. The request to print the testimony as a Senate document was granted, but I am advised that there are some charts and illustrations in it, and under the rule the Printing Office is not permitted to print illustrations or charts unless the Senate so orders. I was seeking to get that permission.

Mr. LODGE. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Printing; in fact, I think under the rule it has to go to that committee. The Senate knows nothing about the illustrations, the cost of printing them, or anything of that kind, and the request should be referred to the Committee on Printing. I do not see any member of that committee in the Chamber at the moment.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to prolong the discussion more than to say that there has been a widespread demand for this testimony taken before the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. LODGE. I do not object to the printing of the document; I have nothing against printing it, but I think it is a rule of the Senate which should be observed that where illustrations are to be reproduced the matter should be referred to the Committee on Printing, so that they may determine what it is to cost. Sometimes the printing of illustrations is very expensive.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I understand my request will go to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in secret session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess, in open executive session, until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess, in open executive session, until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 15, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 14, 1922.

The House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WALSH.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most gracious God, make the day a delight to all. Give us the mind that casts off anxiety, fear, and infirmity. Enable us to take hold of the bigness and the joy of life, and not allow the passing things of time to sadden us. Grant a plentitude of strength and wisdom, that we may see the truth and then love to follow it. Feed all hearts with hope and gladness. O may jealousies continue to cease among the nations and the waters of passion soon recede. Establish our people in the ways of obedience to Thy laws and to the laws of the land, and may morality and intelligence become the absolute securities of our Republic. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD in 8-point type a letter addressed by me to the Ways and Means Committee and other Members of the House. It concerns the extension of the adjusted compensation to the heirs of veterans who died during the war or subsequent to the war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD in 8-point type a letter addressed by him to the members of the Ways and Means Committee and Members of the House relative to the payment of adjusted compensation to the heirs of deceased service men. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, can any Member on the majority side tell us when that bill is to come before us for consideration?

Mr. MONDELL. Which bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The adjusted compensation bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I think we shall be able to give definite information sufficiently in advance of action to be reasonably satisfactory to all gentlemen.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Can the gentleman tell us now in what way it will come before us for consideration—whether there will be an opportunity for debate and amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. That is hardly for me to decide.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman is asking unanimous consent——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Massachusetts is asking unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an expression of views in regard to the measure. His remarks have no bearing on the question as to when the matter shall be considered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD touching compensation to the relatives of deceased soldiers. Of course, the bill, so far as we know anything about it, does not provide for that.

Mr. MANN. It has not been reported.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Whether there will be an opportunity to amend the bill so as to provide for that might become somewhat important.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill has not been reported, so no one knows exactly what its form will ultimately be.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a direct question—do you intend to take the bill up next Monday if the Speaker will recognize you to move to suspend the rules?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that is a question that I can answer. It would not be my province to move to suspend the rules in any event, but in due time and sufficiently in advance to give gentlemen who are away an opportunity to return, I hope we shall be able to announce when and the manner in which the bill is to be taken up.

Mr. GARNER. The reason I am asking the question is that I think gentlemen ought to give the information now because there are Members absent, some candidates for United States Senator——

Mr. MANN. They ought to be here.

Mr. MONDELL. There are other candidates for United States Senator who are on the job. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. And the candidate for United States Senator ought to have sufficient information to advise the House when he is going to call up the bill. [Laughter.] I think the gentleman ought to give us as much information and notice when he expects to take the bill up as he can, and whether he expects to take it up next Monday if the Speaker will recognize him.

Mr. MONDELL. The present organization of the House has given advance notice and information as to the order of business in the House to a greater extent than has ever been done before in the history of this body. I am sure that an earnest effort will be made in the future, as in the past, to inform gentlemen who are away, who ought to be here, when they should be here to vote on measures that may have an influence on their election.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Texas—this seems to be an experience meeting—if the adjusted compensation bill comes up next Monday, will the gentleman from Texas vote for it?

Mr. GARNER. No; of course, I will not; the gentleman from Texas is intelligent as well as the gentleman from Illinois, and he is not going to vote for a monstrosity like this.

Mr. MANN. It has not always been proved. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. GARNER. I have not the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I heard a rumor a few moments ago that the Committee on Ways and Means would meet at 2 o'clock this afternoon. May I ask the gentleman if that is correct?

Mr. GARNER. That is correct. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that there were fortunately a sufficient number of members of the Ways and Means Committee present this morning who desired information on the bill that is likely to come up for consideration to send for these gentlemen who had the necessary information to give to the Congress. It was not in secret but in open session, and although it may be said it was done over the protest of other gentlemen who did not want information but merely an opportunity to record their votes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARNER. At the suggestion of my colleague from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] I might say that the Secretary of the Treasury, the President of the Federal Reserve Board, and the Comptroller of the Currency are supposed to appear before the committee this afternoon and give what information they have concerning the economic effect of this proposed bill on the country.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will that meeting be at the Ways and Means Committee room in the House Office Building?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would the gentleman from Wyoming be willing to have the House adjourn in order that we might go there and obtain that information?

Mr. MONDELL. If gentlemen are not sufficiently interested in the business before the House to remain here, it is their privilege to appear before the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And I have no doubt that some of those might very well be excused.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants to go, I think we can excuse him.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think it is necessary to suspend the business of the House for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

Letter of Congressman ANDREW of Massachusetts addressed to members of Ways and Means Committee and other Members of the House upon paying adjusted compensation to heirs of deceased veterans.

MARCH 9, 1922.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Your attention is called to an omission in the adjusted compensation bill (H. R. 10769), which I believe you will agree involves injustice and has no warrant in logic and ought to be rectified before the bill is presented to a vote of the House.

The bill provides that in case a veteran applies for adjusted compensation and dies before receiving it the compensation to which he was entitled but which he had not received shall be paid to a designated beneficiary, or, failing that, to his estate; but, on the other hand, if he died during the war or since the war and before the act goes into effect and so never had a chance to file an application, no provision is made to pay his adjusted compensation to his heirs or estate. Certainly neither logic nor justice warrants making a distinction between the heirs of those veterans who may die a week after the law goes into effect and the heirs of veterans who may die a week before. Above all, the injustice is manifest of favoring the heirs of veterans who may die in civil life in the future, as compared with the heirs of those who died while actually in the military or naval service of the country, including those who died on the field of battle.

To prevent the commission of what would seem to me an act of inequity and unwisdom, on February 3 I submitted to the Ways and Means Committee an amendment to the adjusted compensation bill along the following lines, to be inserted among the miscellaneous provisions under Title IX:

If any veteran, as defined in section 2, died during the war or shall have died before making application in accordance with the provisions of section 302, the amount of his adjusted-service credit as authorized and defined in the provisions of Title II shall be paid to the relatives hereinafter specified under such regulations as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly prescribe: Provided, That application for such benefits be made on or before July 1, 1923: And provided further, That the deduction of payments for 60 days of active service referred to in the provisions of Title II shall not be made in computing the benefits accruing to the heirs of any veteran who did not receive the payment of $60 under section 1406 of the revenue act of 1918 because of death either before or after the passage of that act.

The benefits authorized by these provisions shall apply, first, to a widow if living and unmarried; second, if there is no widow living and unmarried, then to a child or children; third, if there is no child or children, then to a mother; fourth, if there is no mother, then to a father: Provided, That the terms "child or children" shall include a legitimate child, a child legally adopted, a step-child if a member of the veteran's household, an illegitimate child if acknowledged in writing signed by the parent or if the veteran is judicially decreed to have been the parent of such child, and that the terms "mother" and "father" shall include step-mothers and step-fathers, mothers and fathers through adoption, and persons who have stood in loco parentis to the veteran at any time prior to his enlistment or induction for a period of not less than one year.

Of the nine members of the committee who voted upon this amendment, five, as I am informed, voted against it and four in its favor. Should the amendment never be allowed to come before the House for a vote, one man will then have given the final decision upon a matter which concerns the most deserving sufferers from the war, and for this decision all Representatives in Congress who support the adjusted compensation bill will be held responsible. If the justice of this amendment appears as clear to you as it does to the undersigned, I bespeak your support for it, and ask that you urge upon the members of the committee its incorporation in the bill before the bill is reported to the House.

Respectfully, yours, A. PIATT ANDREW.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes. Pending that, will the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] please state how much time in general debate he needs on his side of the House?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I have had quite a number of requests for time. There are three different items in the bill to which several gentlemen desire to address themselves. Some gentlemen want to talk about rivers and harbors, some about the Army, and several gentlemen wish to speak generally. I think we will need about five hours on this side, and if I should grant these gentlemen all of the time they ask for it would take a great deal more than that.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been suggested that we devote two days to general debate on this bill.

Mr. SISSON. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. ANTHONY. But for the purpose of specifying what we mean by two days, I would suggest nine hours of general debate, four hours and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi and four hours and a half by myself.

Mr. SISSON. If we are going to devote two days to debate, rather than to have some gentleman either on his side or on this side cut out of time I suggest that we continue a little longer.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course, the gentleman knows there is bound to be some other business taken up by the House.

Mr. SISSON. I think that would be satisfactory to me. I do not feel that there would be any objection to continuing the session a little longer in order to accommodate gentlemen on either side of the House. I have no objection to that understanding, that we devote two days to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to nine hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be limited to nine hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question now is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10871, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the bill which is before the committee for consideration is the bill making appropriations for the War Department activities for the next fiscal year. For the first time the measure embraces not only the appropriations for the Army but for rivers and harbors, for fortifications, for the soldiers' homes, for the Panama Canal, and a number of other activities which heretofore have been carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill, the legislative bill, and other measures. In the first place the bill has been divided so that the essential military activities appear in Title I of the bill and the nonmilitary activities are classified under Title II.

The total estimates which came to the committee from the Bureau of the Budget were approximately $360,000,000 for all of the War Department activities for the next fiscal year. Your committee has reported a bill which makes a reduction in the Budget estimates of $87,000,000 for the conduct of the department for the next fiscal year, and I want to say to the House that in making those severe reductions in the estimates of the Budget the committee was animated, first, by the purpose of endeavoring to reduce the expense bill for the conduct of this great Government of ours for the next fiscal year so that we would be able to do our part toward contributing to the grand total of one billion reduction in the expenses of this Government for the next fiscal year as compared with the last fiscal year, which is the result we all hope to attain. [Applause.] Next, we were animated by the desire to bring the appropriations for the conduct of the War Department down to somewhere near the basis that characterized them in the years before the war. All gentlemen know that during the war, with the liberal spirit that characterized this House, appropriations in large lump sums were made for the War Department, which encouraged a spirit of waste, perhaps of extravagance or of liberality, to say the least, in the expenditure of the public funds, and which we have not entirely gotten over as yet; your committee believed it is time to bring the administration of the affairs of the War Department and of the expenditure of the moneys which you appropriate down to what might be called a business basis. We also had the idea in mind that in making these radical cuts there was danger of crippling the military service of the country, and that was the one purpose that was furthest from our thoughts. And I want to assure the House that every reduction which has been made in this bill or limitation which your committee has placed upon it has been made not only with the idea of reducing the expenditures for the Army but of increasing its efficiency and its effectiveness, and we believe that if our recommendations are carried out the Army will not only be more efficient but more effective than it has ever been before. [Applause.] We sought not only to find a way to make these reductions but we sought to find what has been the cause of these large expenditures. We devoted three months of work in committee room in an endeavor to ascertain those facts. We wanted not only to find those facts but after we found them possibly to present them to the House in some constructive form and to give some suggestions as to how these large expenditures could be obviated in the future. We think we have found where the money has been going.

It lies, as I said before, in the expensive method of administering the Army. We found a number of rat holes, gentlemen, and by means of limitations in the bill we are trying to stop them up. For instance, we find that it has been the policy of the General Staff—and I do not desire to speak of the General Staff in a derogatory manner, for they are a very able body of men and splendid officers of our Army—but we find that it is now their desire, and has been, to maintain in Hawaii in time of peace a full division of men, which means 14,000 as the minimum and perhaps 21,000 as the maximum, dependent upon the whim of the department as to the size of the division. We find they want to station a division of men in Panama, 14,000, and unless they are curbed in some way that is what you are going to see within the next year or two. It has cost as much to maintain these divisions in Hawaii and in Panama, or will cost during the next fiscal year, as it cost for our entire Army in the years following the Spanish War. So that your committee felt they would have to put a stop to this plan of stationing such large numbers of troops in our island or outlying possessions and reduce them to a reasonable basis somewhere compatible with what it ought to be.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman indicate on what basis he proposes to determine whether or not we need less soldiers in Hawaii and Panama than at the present time?

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, the committee is forced to use its judgment to a large extent. The general thought in defense of the Panama Canal and the western coast and all of our military defense both in Hawaii and in Panama are predicated upon the American Navy being first wiped off the seas; but with a Navy probably the strongest on the seas to-day I do not think there is any probability we will have to face that event. So I do not believe it is necessary to maintain these immense garrisons at these points, and especially when they are so quickly accessible by ordinary means of transportation as they are now.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The conclusion the committee has reached is not concurred in by the Secretary of War nor Gen. Pershing.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no; of course, they are not concurred in by these military gentlemen, and there is no more true statement that can be made than the one made by Lord Lee, one of the English representatives at the recent disarmament conference in Washington, who in speaking of England's placing large garrisons all over the world said that if the English general staff was left alone they would put a garrison on the face of the moon. It is true of any army that they will overgarrison any spot under the idea of taking extra precautions. This large saving of $87,000,000 that has been made from the estimates of the Budget may not all be net. I will say to the committee there are $13,000,000 included for pay of the Army. For the last three years we have been paying the Army a 20 per cent increase over the pay provided in the basic law of 1908. That temporary increase expires June 30 next. This bill provides for the pay of the Army beginning the 1st of July next, so the only law which we had upon which to base the pay of the Army is the basic law of 1908.

The measure now pending before this body, embodying the McKenzie bill, which I understand will shortly come before you for consideration, if adopted increases the base pay of 1908, and it will be necessary to augment the pay provision of this bill with an additional appropriation covering any increase which the House may make. Now, in reference to the size of the Army, this bill limits the number of enlisted men to 115,000. The Army to-day is approximately 140,000 men. Last year we authorized a total of 158,000, including the Philippine Scouts. In this bill the Army is limited to an enlisted force of 115,000 plus 7,000 Philippine Scouts, making a total of 122,000 enlisted men.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. How is the limit fixed?

Mr. ANTHONY. By a reduction of the amount of the appropriation for pay of enlisted men, and a provision in the bill that the amount appropriated in the bill shall not be exceeded for the purposes for which they are appropriated.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kansas whether they took into consideration the question of the abandoning of the Philippine Scouts? That proposition, as the gentleman knows, was discussed in our committee a number of times, and for one I am not in favor of continuing an army of Philippine Scouts.

Mr. ANTHONY. That question was not considered by the committee, but we discussed the Philippine situation in detail with both Gen. Pershing and Secretary of War Weeks. We have approximately 7,000 American troops in the Philippines and 7,000 Philippine Scouts. The Secretary stated he believed conditions were such that he would withdraw a large part of the American troops from the Philippines in the near future, and that would leave the garrisons in the islands very largely in the hands of the Philippine Scouts, which are recognized as a highly efficient body of men. And, further than that, they are an economical body of men for Congress to maintain, because their pay is one-half of the pay of the American enlisted men, and their maintenance is much less.

Mr. McKENZIE. Of course, it is contended by some of us that the Philippine people should maintain their own National Guard for the purpose of keeping order in the Philippine Islands, and that it should not be a charge upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course, the gentleman knows that the Philippine Constabulary occupies about the same position in the Philippines that the National Guard does in this country, and to all intents and purposes the Philippine Scouts are in the Regular Army—at least officered by officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. What is the number of officers at the present time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will get to that in a moment. With the reductions we propose to make in the garrisons in Hawaii and Panama—and I will say that a provision in this bill also withdraws the troops from the Rhine by July 1, and we leave 500 men on the continent of Europe largely for the purposes of cleaning up there; I presume it will be necessary to utilize a number of men in connection with the Graves Registration Service in France and work of that kind—and with the curtailment of these foreign garrisons there will be approximately 17,000 men returned to the United States, just about the number we propose to reduce the Regular Army by, thus meeting the principal criticism that can be offered to our reduction of the enlisted force at this time, namely, that we may be reducing the Regular Army below the safety point for our internal protection in this country; but by reducing our foreign garrisons we are augmenting the force stationed in the United States to a point even larger than it is to-day.

And in this connection the House should take into consideration the fact that our National Guard is growing by leaps and bounds. It is no longer a paper army, but it is composed of a body of 142,000 men, almost as efficient as are the soldiers of our regular service. We figured that by the beginning of the next fiscal year, by midsummer, it will number 160,000 men, and that by the end of the next fiscal year its growth will take it to a maximum of 190,000 men. So that there can be no charge made that the slight reductions we are making in officers and men in the regular service leaves this country without an adequate military force for its protection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In the reduction of officers I believe the bill provides that those in the service shall be demoted or retired under certain conditions?

Mr. ANTHONY. I was just going to take that up.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Who is going to say who the surplus officers are? Who is going to pick out the officers who are going to be fired?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will all be done under regulations approved by the President of the United States, and the committee presumes that, if the language of the bill is enacted into law, the machinery of the Pershing bill will be used for the purpose; that is, boards of general officers acting under regulations approved by the President.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Why not let Congress say how they should be fired? Why leave it up to the Secretary of War?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not believe it is in the province of Congress to place an estimate on the capacity of individual officers.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. But Congress can set up the machinery by which it can be arrived at.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we can very safely leave it to the President and Gen. Pershing.

To discuss further the commissioned personnel of the Army, this bill limits the number of commissioned officers to 11,000. We now have 13,000, approximately, in the commissioned personnel of the Army. Seventeen thousand officers are authorized by the reorganization act of 1920, but we find this condition exists: While we limited last year the number of commissioned officers to 14,000 in our appropriation bill, and the number actually appointed was 13,000, we find that the War Department has gone ahead and made promotions in the Regular Army on the basis of the full number of 17,000 officers. So you have got the full number of colonels and lieutenant colonels and majors, and so forth, to-day in a commissioned personnel of 13,000 that the Congress authorized for the maximum of 17,000 officers. Of course it is costing the country an unnecessarily large amount of money, and it has thrown the commissioned force of the Army entirely out of balance. It has left us without any second lieutenants, so to speak. This bill proposes to correct the condition in which we find the commissioned personnel of the Army. We feel that 11,000, a reduction of 2,000 from the present number, will be an ample commissioned force. In reducing the commissioned force of the Army Congress can not make an arbitrary reduction and leave it to the department to get rid of the surplus, because under the present law there are only two ways to get rid of a commissioned officer of the Army—to accept his voluntary resignation or try him by court-martial for misconduct and give him a dishonorable discharge. So this particular legislation that we propose is necessary in order to cut down the commissioned personnel of the Army by 2,000, which the committee has decided is the proper thing to do at this juncture.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I heard a very prominent Senator of the gentleman's party say in the Senate the other day that 14,000 officers was a sufficient number to officer an army of 450,000 men, and he stated that these 14,000 officers were costing the taxpayers $53,000,000 a year, and he further stated that if the Army was reduced to 100,000 men, and the number of officers in proportion, it would save the taxpayers of this Government $100,000,000 a year.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that is a rather extravagant statement, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. KINCHELOE. How many civilians are employed in the Army to-day?

Mr. ANTHONY. The reduction which has been made in the civilian force has been very marked in the last year as the result of the limitations contained in the current Army appropriation bill and the energetic action of Secretary of War Weeks in reducing numbers of civilian employees.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Is it not a fact that there are about 40,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. The number of civilians to-day is slightly in excess of what it was before the war, in addition to the forces employed in the Chemical Warfare Service and the Aviation Service. Aside from those services I do not believe there are in excess of 10,000 more civilians in the Army to-day than there were before the war.

Mr. KINCHELOE. What is the total?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have not the total at my tongue's end, but I can give it to you in a few minutes. I should say it was in the neighborhood of 50,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit an interruption, I can give the latest figures furnished by the War Department of civilians in the field. It is 49,046.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am obliged to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the gentleman think that number is necessary?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Secretary of War stated to us that the number of civilians had been reduced almost to what it was before the war, with the exception of the new services that I have mentioned. There is no question but that the number has been radically reduced and is being still further reduced.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question along that line?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. Does that include the civilians employed on the Isthmus of Panama?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. That would be a nonmilitary activity.

Mr. TILSON. While they are connected with the department, they are not a part of the Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. In framing your bill, do you make provision for the highly technical branches of the service, such as aviation, the Chemical Warfare Service, and the Medical Service?

Mr. ANTHONY. We feel that we have made most liberal provisions for these different bureaus.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. FISHER. Do I understand correctly that we have over 13,000 officers in our Army now?

Mr. ANTHONY. Twelve thousand nine hundred and eighty.

Mr. FISHER. Now, just what procedure is suggested whereby the Army would carry out the dismissal of the difference between that number and 11,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall be glad to explain that to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] to say that there are 45,000 civilian employees in the Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. Approximately.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. With an Army of 115,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That would be one for every three.

Mr. ANTHONY. About that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What do they do?

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me give you one illustration: Take the Air Service of the Army, for example. We have 1,200 officers and nearly 8,000 enlisted men, or did have a short time ago. But with those 1,200 officers and nearly 8,000 enlisted men our Air Service has not been able to get up into the air without the assistance of 6,000 civilians, most of them mechanics.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is 6,000 out of 45,000. What do the other 39,000 do?

Mr. ANTHONY. There must be 15,000 or 20,000 of these employees connected with the Quartermaster Corps, connected with the various manufacturing activities and other activities connected with the service.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That would be one man in three.

Mr. SISSON. I have some figures here that I would like to put in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would be glad if the gentleman would make the statement.

Mr. SISSON. I give only the large employments, not the small ones. In the Quartermaster Corps there are 13,469; in the Medical Department there are 1,175; in the Engineer Department there are 19,189; in the Ordnance Department there are 6,000; in the Signal Service there are 344. Then, there are several small items of less than 100. Then, in the Air Service there are 3,400 and in the financial department there are 905. These men are all in the field service, and there are numbers that are not in the field service.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am just informed by the clerk to the committee that the maximum of 45,000 does not include civil work under the supervision of the War Department.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; that is true.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman stated that there were about 19,000 civil employees in the Engineer Department. Are they engaged in river and harbor work?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Not those employed by contractors, but wherever the Government itself is doing the work, and there are certain civilian employees supervising the work; the civilian employees are included in this calculation.

Mr. HILL. How many are in river and harbor work?

Mr. SISSON. Well, we have various activities under the Engineer Department other than river and harbor work. In the service in connection with rivers and harbors, where the contracts are let to the contractors, those men doing the work are paid by the contractors out of another fund, and they are not included in this.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. I have in mind the Watervliet Arsenal. Do the civilian employees of the Army include those at the arsenals?

Mr. ANTHONY. They would be paid from the Government pay roll at the arsenals; yes.

Now, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. FISHER] just suggested, it is necessary that we provide machinery by which we may get rid of the 2,000 officers, by which number we propose to reduce the force. Legislation is necessary for that purpose. But this committee has provided the legislative machinery to accomplish that end under the broad provisions of the Holman rule, because if we reduce the Army by 2,000 commissioned officers, it must be perfectly apparent to every Member that with an officer costing us on an average $3,000 per annum in salary a reduction of 2,000 officers makes a saving of $6,000,000 on the face of the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would rather complete this statement first in regard to officers. Then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. DYER. This is on the question of civilians.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would rather finish this statement first.

Now, in order to accomplish this reduction of officers the bill provides, first, that there shall be a limit to the number of officers in each grade. Thus we shall restore to the Army the exact proportion of officers in each grade as provided in the reorganization act of 1920. For instance, that act authorized 4 per cent of colonels, or 600.

We are providing in this reduction of 2,000 officers to a maximum of 11,000, 4 per cent of colonels, and then the exact proportion of lieutenant colonels and majors, captains, and first lieutenants. Therefore it is manifest that there will be a number of officers in each grade to be disposed of, and this bill provides that these officers can be recommissioned in the next lower grade if they are officers whom the department wishes to keep in the service, or if they have less than 10 years of service to their credit they may be discharged with 1 year's pay. That was the amount of pay provided by the Government when it discharged a number of officers after the Civil War.

Next we provide that if an officer has more than 10 years' service and less than 20 years of service to his credit he may be placed on the retired list with pay at the rate of 2½ per cent of his annual pay multiplied by the number of years of service. If he has 20 years of service and less than 30 years, we provide that he may have 3 per cent of his annual pay multiplied by the years of his service, but not exceeding the 75 per cent to which he would be entitled when he had served the maximum, as now provided by law. All this is to be done under regulations to be approved by the President, which means the appointment of suitable boards to eliminate the surplus officers.

In the bill which is pending before the House sponsored by Gen. Pershing it is my understanding that the officers that he proposes to get rid of are referred to as the least efficient officers. The bill now under consideration does not classify as inefficient the men we propose to get rid of. We classify them as surplus in their grades, leaving it to the judgment of the department as to the individuals who should be taken out of the Army.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I have not yet been able to read the bill. Are the legislative provisions to which the gentleman refers carried in the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are carried in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Of course, they will go out on a point of order unless there is a rule to keep them in. Does the gentleman expect to have such a rule?

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee rather thought that under the provisions of the Holman rule this legislation would stay in the bill. We hope it will, at any rate.

Mr. MANN. It is possible that that may be so.

Mr. TILSON. Are not a number of these provisions simply limitations?

Mr. MANN. You can not bring in as a limitation a provision discharging men and providing how they may be discharged.

Mr. TILSON. No; but they can provide that no money shall be paid to officers in excess of a certain number.

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly; but I thought the outline given by the gentleman from Kansas contemplated legislation.

Mr. ANTHONY. At any rate, I will say to the gentleman that this is the only avenue which the committee saw open through which to achieve an early reduction in the size of the Army.

Mr. MANN. I think the provisions ought to be kept in the bill, even if it requires a rule to make them in order.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. I recall that when Judge Saunders, of Virginia, was presiding in the Committee of the Whole he held in order under the Holman rule a provision reducing the number of Cavalry regiments on the ground that as a matter of fact it effected an economy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. How many officers are stationed in Washington at this time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think I have seen the statement that there are possibly a thousand officers stationed in Washington and hereabouts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I understand there are between 1,700 and 1,800.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that is in excess of the true number. There may be 1,100 or 1,200. I understand the department is taking measures to reduce that number.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. About how much?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no means of ascertaining.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman think something ought to be done toward reducing the number of officers here? It is generally talked around that we have an excess of officers in this town.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Army has had a great many activities to look after and lots of work to do in closing up the big things that we had on hand during the war, and most of the officers who have been in Washington have been engaged in practical work for the Government. That has been my observation.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. Can the gentleman tell us what is the strength of our Military Establishment in the Philippines, including our civilian employees in the employ of the Army there?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can only give the gentleman the military strength there, which is 7,000 men of the American Regular Army and 6,900 Philippine Scouts.

Mr. DYER. How many officers?

Mr. ANTHONY. The clerk of the committee can give the gentleman that information.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman know whether or not it is the intention to bring home the Army now in the Philippines and to allow the Philippine Scouts, with native officers and men, to take care of the situation there?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Secretary of War stated to the committee that it was his intention to reduce largely the number of American troops in the Philippines. That is all the statement we have.

Mr. DYER. Did he make to the subcommittee any statement with reference to bringing them back entirely and letting the Filipinos manage their own military affairs?

Mr. ANTHONY. He announced no definite policy, except as I have stated to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I should like to have a clear understanding of what is included within the term "civilian employees"? I ask this question because the gentleman mentioned the Quartermaster's Bureau. Does that term include the clerks in the Quartermaster's office here in Washington?

Mr. ANTHONY. The maximum number which we gave?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The total number of civilian employees of the Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. I take it that the civilian employees mentioned include all the civilians paid from the money appropriated in this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Are the clerks in the Quartermaster's Department paid out of the appropriation in this bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Let me say that I had it from a member of the committee who heard the testimony that there are about 45,000 civil employees in the employ of the Army outside of the District of Columbia. He did not describe the nature of the employment, but that was about the number of civil employees.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was wondering how one man in three outside the District of Columbia could be employed in the Regular Army as a civilian.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, I will take up some of the items covered by the bill. For the Reserve Officers' Training Corps activities and from the standpoint of affording military training, they are accomplishing a splendid work. They are training at schools and colleges approximately 112,000 young men—45,000 in the high schools and 60,000 in the units at colleges. Last year we appropriated $2,850,000, and this year we are giving them $2,750,000; but we are also providing that there shall be furnished certain equipment and supplies—uniforms—which will augment the appropriation half a million dollars, so that we are amply providing for the continuation of the work.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. HILL. I want to call attention to the bill to which reference has been made for the reduction of the number of the personnel of the Army. It uses the word "supernumeraries" and not "inefficient."

Mr. ANTHONY. Our idea was to avoid stigmatizing any officer as being inefficient.

Mr. HILL. That was the idea of the Military Affairs Committee, and section 4 of the bill says that the Secretary of War shall convene a board of five general officers, and so forth, who shall deal with "supernumeraries" and not inefficient.

Mr. ANTHONY. In the present bill we use the term "surplus."

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. SNELL. I understand the officers of the department will continue the same military training camps that you had last year.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman refers to the civilian military training. In regard to that I will say that the appropriation for the current year was $900,000, and we trained 10,000 in the summer camps with that money. This year we are providing $1,900,000 for that work under which we feel that the department will be able to train 25,000 to 30,000 civilians. With this appropriation we give authority to use available surplus supplies in the quartermaster's department. For instance, we found 5,000,000 yards of uniform cloth that had better be made up now for the men's use than to keep it on hand five or six more years, and by giving them these supplies at the civilian training camps it augments their appropriation fully half a million dollars. So, for both branches of the civilian training the committee has made much more liberal appropriation than for the current year.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. Is the department to create additional camps, or extend the ones they now have?

Mr. ANTHONY. In the report the committee takes the liberty of recommending more camps and that they be scattered over the country geographically so as to cut down the expense of transportation, which runs very large during the present year, and using the existing facilities at military posts so they can conduct the camps much cheaper than in the past.

The next important item is the Air Service. We gave the Army $19,000,000 for the Air Service during the current year. The Bureau of the Budget sent in an estimate of $15,000,000 for the next fiscal year. The committee has allowed twelve million and some hundred thousand, and in doing so we still believe we are making ample provision for the Air Service. We have made some reductions which we believe have been made along lines where it should be made. We are reducing the appropriation for the employment of civilian forces which various gentlemen in the House have been inquiring about.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNYDER. Can the gentleman tell us whether there has been any perceptible gain in the efficiency of the flying service within the last year?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that there is a perceptible increase in efficiency all along the line.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman state whether the machines they are now using will be any great improvement over those that they have been using?

Mr. ANTHONY. I intend to take that up in a minute.

Mr. SNYDER. I was wondering whether with the reduction in the amount of the appropriation you are certain that the service will be better and more efficient in the future than in the past.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no reduction in the amount we provide for new airplanes, we are giving every cent that they ask for.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the ivestigation show that the construction of flying machines was improved to any amount last year?

Mr. ANTHONY. This seems to be the situation: We found where the Air Service had made what we thought was a blunder in spending money for the Barling bomber, a gigantic plane of which they are building two up in New Jersey, that cost $375,000 a piece. They cost $375,000 a piece. There are two of them under contract, and we are informed that when completed they will be equipped with six Liberty engines each and will have such a tremendous spread of wing, such a tremendous weight, that they claim there is no landing field in this part of the country where it would be safe to fly from or to land. Gen. Patrick told us that as soon as that machine was finished, which would be shortly, he would have to dismantle it completely, put it on shipboard in New York, send it by water around to the flying fields near San Antonio—the Ellington and Kelly Fields in Texas—as that was the only place in the country where he thought it would be safe to put the monster in the air and land it again. The committee naturally concluded that that is an absurd machine for practical use.

Mr. SNYDER. To carry the question a trifle further, I am wondering whether there is a comprehensive plan worked out so that it has been determined that certain types of machine are the types that would be regular and proper for the future business of warfare.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, I think not. I think we are still in a state of flux, if I may use that expression, and we are all looking forward to the development of a plane which will be absolutely safe in the air, and which will fulfill all of our expectations.

Mr. SNYDER. I am somewhat familiar with the idea of spending three or four hundred thousand dollars and experimenting with a machine such as the gentleman has just described, which when you get it done you have to take down and transport rather than fly it from the place of its construction to the place it is desired to operate it. It seems to me that is very silly, and the people generally are feeling that way about the Air Service, at least those that I come in contact with.

Mr. ANTHONY. To continue with the gentleman's question along the line of what has happened in the development of airplanes, last year we were assured by the Air Service that the development of a proper pursuit plane, which is the combat plane used by the Army, was the most important thing they had in view. They claimed they had developed what they call the Thomas-Morse pursuit plane, which was all that they hoped to have, the very fastest and the best combat plane possible to manufacture.

For the last two years we have given them ample funds with which to supply these Thomas-Morse machines. They are now coming through—some of them delivered and some hundreds more to be delivered—and to our surprise and astonishment, in the examination of the Air Service officials the other day, they apologized to us, and said that they were sorry, but that they were unable to obey the mandate of the current year's appropriation act. We did not merely appropriate $6,000,000 but we ordered them to expend $6,000,000 for new planes. They apologized, and said that they had not been able to do that, because the types of plane which they thought they had perfected were not such as they thought they were. In other words, they are going to slow up on the types that they thought were final; and there is still $2,000,000 of this year's appropriation they have been unable to expend. In Dayton they have now under experimentation the Loening and the Verville, two types they say are better than the Thomas-Morse, and we are providing $2,300,000—all they ask—to go into the manufacture of those types.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is the gentleman going to discuss the dirigible proposition? What has been done in respect to the purchase of more dirigibles and with respect to helium gas?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a limitation under which the department can not expend to exceed $400,000 for lighter-than-air machines. We put that limitation in purposely so that they would buy no more of these Romas or R-34's or any other of these big, useless gas bags.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is there any appropriation made for helium?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. We have increased it from $250,000, which the Budget asked for, which the War Department asked for, to $400,000, although the committee is convinced that we have not facilities existing now, even after the expenditure of from ten to fourteen million dollars, with which we can manufacture helium practically from a commercial standpoint. There is no certainty that with the $400,000 which this bill provides and the $400,000 which the naval bill will provide—$800,000 in all—we will get an appreciable amount of helium. They claim it will give us 12,000,000 feet of helium if they are allowed the funds to operate the Fort Worth plant for 12 months at $70,000 per month, but the committee doubts this.

We are of the opinion that these large gas bags like the Roma and other ships of similar type have not the slightest military value, and that it is a waste of money for Congress to expend a cent for their acquisition or for their construction. The House ought to know that the Roma was not purchased by funds which this committee reported in any of its recent appropriation bills. The Roma was purchased over a year ago by the War Department out of funds which still hung over from those appropriated for the conduct of the war, and was purchased without any direct authorization of Congress.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Did I understand the gentleman to state that it is the purpose to authorize the War Department to reopen the helium plant at Fort Worth at once? I understand it has been shut down.

Mr. ANTHONY. We make an appropriation of $400,000 for that purpose, and the naval bill will augment that by an equal amount, I understand.

Mr. HUDSPETH. How long will this appropriation run this plant?

Mr. ANTHONY. They claim it costs $70,000 per month to operate the Fort Worth plant. The gentleman can figure for himself how long $800,000 will run the plant—approximately a year.

Mr. HUDSPETH. That is for the Fort Worth plant solely?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the only one they say is in any condition to produce helium at the present time.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman explain why any money is expended on these large gas bags when the committee does not consider them of any military value?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a limitation in the bill of $400,000. There will be no large balloon like the Roma purchased. This is for the purpose of building smaller gas bags, semirigid in type, which the committee feels are necessary, and we would have enough helium to fill them. They are necessary for observation of artillery fire and other military purposes.

We have a number of these small balloons left over from the war. The committee thought we had an ample number on hand, but upon investigation we found that the rubber deteriorates, and in three or four years since their manufacture the fabric has deteriorated so that it is necessary to let the Army have a half dozen more of that type for practice use and training.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. SNELL. Are there any more of these floating funds of the War Department whereby they can buy one of these large balloons?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think there are any. The committee made an exhaustive study of the status of the appropriations of the War Department, and the gentleman will find this bill carries a provision authorizing the return of $9,000,000 of unallotted and unexpended funds of the type the gentleman describes, so that with the enactment of this bill we have put an end to the use of any loose money which the War Department might have.

Mr. SNELL. I think that is a very wise provision of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. The appropriation for ordnance is covered by items formerly carried in the fortification act and the sundry civil bill for the manufacture of coast-defense guns, and so forth. In our ordnance appropriation we are just appropriating enough money so that a majority of the arsenals of the country can be operated on what they tell us is 10 per cent of the maximum capacity. We find that it would be an unwise military policy entirely to close down these big arsenals, and as I say, there will be a skeleton force maintained at each one of them, and they will be operated up to what will be about 10 per cent of their maximum capacity, which will be considerably less than they are being operated for during the current year. On our big-gun program we have authorized the continuation of the construction and made provision so that they may complete the necessary number of 16-inch guns, which are far enough advanced in their manufacture so it would be better to complete them rather than to use some of the surplus 16-inch naval guns and adapt them for the purpose which will be rendered surplus by the decrease in our naval force. We propose to authorize the completion of enough 16-inch guns to man the works at Fort Tilden, Rockaway, N. Y., where there is a battery of 16-inch guns going in. We authorize the 16-inch guns which go in at Fort Story to command the entrance to Chesapeake Bay and the completion of that project. We complete the guns and the project for the 16-inch fortification at Keoti Point, Hawaii, and the 16-inch project on the western approach to the Panama Canal. Aside from that the big guns authorized for manufacture at our arsenals are a certain number along the lines of experimentation and development, and there are but a few allowed to be carried through for experimentation purposes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. As to the guns to man the west approach to the Panama Canal, is it proposed to add to the number of the guns there, or merely change those that are on top of that high rock? There are two of them there, I think 14-inch——

Mr. ANTHONY. We have two 16-inch guns there in order to increase the range.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What about the battery that is down behind the rock. Will those be changed?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think there will be any change in the existing battery. The batteries will be augmented by these 16-inch guns. That brings up the problem of what the present range of those large guns is. The committee every year has a number of scarecrows brought before it, so that we will make liberal appropriations for big guns.

One argument advanced this year was that certain ships of foreign navies had guns mounted on them that can outrange any guns which we have in our shore fortifications. When pressed to name the specific ship of a specific navy that had such a gun as that in existence they were unable to furnish the information to the committee, and the committee as a result of its investigation still believes that guns mounted on land defenses outrange by far any gun which can be possibly mounted on board a ship for the reason that to secure the range the gun must be elevated to a point, and the recoil consequently from a gun elevated to secure that long range on the deck of a ship is said to be sufficient to crush almost any deck from which the gun is fired.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. Are any of these 16-inch guns to be placed at the mouth of the Delaware in order to protect the entrance to the bay?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not as yet. There are only the 16-inch guns provided for New York and the Chesapeake Bay in this country, so far as authorized by this bill.

Mr. LAYTON. May I ask another question, if the gentleman will yield? What will be done with all the 16-inch guns upon the vessels that are to be scrapped? Are they to be scrapped?

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman will go down to the navy yard in Washington, he will see a pile of guns that have already been completed for use for the Navy that possibly will never be mounted. Now, the suggestion came to the committee that it might be possible to utilize those naval guns already manufactured for our land fortifications, but they claim it will increase the cost of the naval guns to adapt them for land defenses about 40 per cent.

Mr. LAYTON. So the 16-inch guns upon naval vessels to be scrapped will be scrapped also?

Mr. ANTHONY. The guns——

Mr. SWING. If the gentleman will permit, the naval guns last about so long when they are in use and these surplus guns will be used, but in time as these guns become worn out they are taken off and sent in to be repaired and in this way the ships will be kept with a supply of efficient guns all the time.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Possibly the gentleman covered this before I entered the Hall; if so, he need not repeat himself. I notice the committee has recommended to the House a restriction upon the number of men who shall be retained in the garrison at the Hawaiian Islands. Has the gentleman covered that?

Mr. ANTHONY. I made that statement; yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do not care to have it gone into again.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Do I understand the committee fixes the exact number of men that should be in those places?

Mr. ANTHONY. Except in time of emergency, they shall not exceed 5,000.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. And the War Department has no discretion about increasing the number at any of those places?

Mr. ANTHONY. At their discretion, they can station a thousand there if they want to.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. But they can not have more?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not more than 5,000, unless they think it is an emergency.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. If they think there is an emergency——

Mr. ANTHONY. Then they can station 100,000.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. That is the thing I wanted to know, because the thing that worries me is the difficulty of getting reinforcements to those places in case of trouble, because of the distance being so great.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman will admit it is easier for this country to reinforce the garrisons at Hawaii and Panama than it would be for any other country to reach them.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. To reinforce those places?

Mr. ANTHONY. To send any military force to those places.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I was not thinking of that as much as I was of the local conditions. We all know before we took over the Panama Canal there were 20 or 30 revolutions a year.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that we have a force of 70 policemen in the Panama Zone maintained by this bill, and we think they can take care of any revolution.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Are they under the War Department?

Mr. ANTHONY. Under the Panama Canal administration.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the gentleman think the Panama Canal Zone is altogether different from all the other possessions we have? For instance, in the event of war, should we be caught there with a very small force, before we could get reinforcements there would not it be possible in a revolution in connection with foreign trouble for them to blow up the canal before we could get there?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is quite right. It is the most important point we have, and we should and will have an adequate force to prevent damage to the canal.

Mr. LAZARO. Have you made provision for that?

Mr. ANTHONY. Abundant provision.

Mr. LAZARO. How many men?

Mr. ANTHONY. Five thousand. And in addition, there is a force of marines there, and in addition there is the naval air force, and in addition there is the Navy on the Pacific and the Atlantic. In other words, we think it is very well defended at this time.

For chemical warfare the Budget asked for $1,500,000. In view of the Disarmament Conference they subsequently modified that to $500,000, which the committee has appropriated. That permits the continuation of experimentation and development work at the Edgewood Arsenal and permits it to be kept in a stand-by condition, and permits the manufacture of improved masks for experimental purposes and maintains a small force of men there so that it can be expanded if need be, but makes no provision for going into the manufacture of a large amount of chemicals to be used in warfare.

Now, as to the National Guard, the Budget asked for $30,000,000. The committee appropriates $21,000,000. As I explained to the committee a few moments ago, the guard is growing very fast. The committee desires to appropriate every dollar necessary to enable it to continue that growth, as we consider it one of the most valuable military assets we have, but we found that in the method of its organization great economies can be worked out. In other words, the War Department is permitting the National Guard to develop along the most expensive lines instead of along the most economical lines. For instance, last year we placed a limitation on the number of animals they should have in the Regular Army. While we have gotten rid of that number of animals in the Regular Army they have increased the number in the National Guard. The same thing is true of motors. They have loaded the Naional Guard down with animals and surplus motors of all kinds that it costs a lot of money to keep up. So we have a limitation in this bill that there shall be no more than 4,000 animals in the National Guard. That reduces the appropriation for forage. The House should remember that for every mounted organization in the guard, for every motorized organization in the guard, there is a provision for five caretakers or mechanics at a total of $400 per month for each unit, and it runs into the millions of dollars, and we are trying to cut down that expense of the mounted, motorized, and technical forces.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The committee is recommending that the hiring of these expert mechanics, either in part or for full time, should be done away with?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not altogether. For instance, in the organization of a tank company in the National Guard, they issue 14 of these big tanks to it. We found out that each mounted troop of the National Guard or each battery has 32 horses. And in many of the county-seat towns, where these organizations exist, we find the horses have been in the livery stables, with five civilian attendants taking care of them all during the winter months, and that the horses have had little or nothing to do.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I believe in preventing that. Where there is a regiment of artillery that has been motorized, certainly expert mechanics ought to be required to take care of that equipment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. They will be allowed under this?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, yes; we have appropriated a certain amount for that. We may have to reduce under this bill the number of mounted units and number of motorized units. Heretofore, the guard has been able to hire horses for its artillery training. We do not know whether that would be practical or not.

But we are making liberal appropriations for the summer training period of the guard, when the Government will be able to provide all motors and all horses necessary for the guard during the training period.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. As I understand this bill, it provides a limit of 4,000 animals for the National Guard?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman say what number was asked for by the War Department?

Mr. ANTHONY. Nine thousand two hundred.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Where mounted troops have been provided they are working their horses very hard and using them over and over again. I am very much worried over the danger of the diminution in the number of these horses. Is it necessary that these be reduced?

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee felt that it was.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In the whole number?

Mr. ANTHONY. The department asked for an increase. They have 8,000 now, and they wanted 9,200. The committee felt that the mounted units should be kept at not exceeding 4,000 animals.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Here is a body of Cavalry, a regiment, we will say, under the command of a lieutenant colonel, learning how to drill. My experience has been that mounted men will make better officers than unmounted.

Mr. ANTHONY. That regiment of National Guard Cavalry is a fine thing, undoubtedly, but the men can receive the necessary military training, and they will be just as valuable military assets for the country if they receive Infantry training instead of Cavalry training, which will cost only half as much.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is the gentleman sure of that, that Infantry training makes as good an officer as the Cavalry training?

Mr. ANTHONY. Our experience has been that the Infantry is the backbone of any army.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. One Cavalry troop that I know of, with 32 men in it, turned 272 officers into the World War.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that while it does not fall to the lot of this committee to determine a military policy, yet if we could do it we would have the National Guard, most largely for economical reasons, more largely composed of Infantry organizations, leaving it to the Regular Army to supply the mounted organizations and the technical organizations such as the Chemical Warfare Service, and the Tank Service, and the Air Service, which cost a lot of money.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does the gentleman realize that in the East no horses can be hired any more in our big cities? They have to be owned and used for governmental purposes. If there is any need for a mounted service we could not get horses except those.

Mr. ANTHONY. I agree with the gentleman. I think that in a few years we may not have any Cavalry at all.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Does this bill make any reduction in the Cavalry as such?

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not. It leaves that entirely with the department.

Mr. HILL. There are about 12,000 Cavalry on the border now to cover 1,700 miles of border?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. But there is no forced reduction made?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. McKENZIE. While the gentleman is on the subject of the National Guard economy, what has the gentleman to say about furnishing aircraft in the National Guard?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have taken the position that no further organization of technical companies should be permitted in the National Guard. That embraces, as I say, Chemical Warfare Service, the Air Service, and other such units. We believe that the Regular Army should furnish those elements.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman believe that tanks belong to the technical side of the Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I do.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. The gentleman says it takes a great deal of money to have airplanes and those other things?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. If the States are willing to pay the money for it, they can do it.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Some of the States are contemplating that. The gentleman has no objection to that?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I have not.

Now, with reference to appropriations for rivers and harbors, the committee has provided $27,635,260, the full amount asked for by the Budget Bureau for this year. This is appropriated in a lump sum. No specific items are mentioned, the same as in the case of the appropriation bills during the last two or three years.

Of this sum of $27,635,260 the committee is informed that about half of it is for carrying on maintenance work solely, and about half of it is for carrying on construction work on existing approved projects. We were informed by the Chief of Engineers that in his judgment, as the result of reports made by his district engineers, we ought to appropriate at least $60,000,000 for this purpose during the next fiscal year. But the Chief of Engineers has revised the figures of his district engineers and boiled them down to about $43,000,000, upon which he based his recommendation to the Budget Bureau and our committee. The Budget Bureau approved a total of $27,635,260.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will a part of this appropriation for rivers and harbors permit a survey being made of different rivers with a view to building levees to prevent overflows?

Mr. ANTHONY. It does. There is something like $325,000 additional carried for survey purposes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I understand this $325,000 is for a special purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not entirely a special purpose.

Mr. CHALMERS. That is for the survey of certain canals in Ohio.

Mr. ANTHONY. No. The committee agreed originally upon $200,000 for survey purposes, after which a number of Members of the House appeared before us and impressed upon us the necessity of a larger sum for this purpose, and the committee increased the amount from $200,000 to $325,000, having specifically in view the survey of three projects in contemplation for the construction of canals between Lake Erie and the Ohio River.

Mr. CHALMERS. I understand that estimate is $225,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee has increased its appropriation only $125,000.

Mr. CHALMERS. That would leave only $175,000 for the general survey work, as referred to by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would leave $200,000.

Mr. CHALMERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman two or three other questions on this same matter. The gentleman knows that this appropriation of $27,500,000 is a revised amount reached after several hearings on the subject.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that in order to find out the amount of money that will be applied to specific approved projects it will be necessary to take the proportion of 27/42 of the amount mentioned in the schedule printed in the hearings, which was furnished us by the Chief of Engineers for his proposed total of $43,000,000. Then he will get about the amount of money they propose to expend on each of the approved projects.

Mr. CHALMERS. Is that mandatory?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not mandatory. It is to be expended under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, so that it is optional with the War Department.

Mr. CHALMERS. But they can apply any proportion they see fit to any particular project, so far as the War Department is concerned.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true, but these expenditures are made in accordance with a certain definite policy which has been approved and continued from year to year.

Mr. CHALMERS. As I understand, some very important projects are being investigated by the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and if my recollection is correct $400,000 was appropriated last year for surveys. Now, this year you are appropriating only a little over $300,000 for that purpose; $225,000 of this to be expended for special work, leaving only $100,000 as against $400,000 last year.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are appropriating $325,000 for surveys.

Mr. CHALMERS. With a new provision for $225,000 for a particular purpose, leaving very little money for the general work of surveys for the whole country. My own opinion is that It is not sufficient.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. During the war the Government owned and operated barges on the Erie Canal and Black Warrior and Mississippi Rivers. I believe that some time last year we provided for the sale of the barges on the Erie Canal and stopped the Government operation of them there. Can the gentleman tell me in a few words just what is the condition of our operations at the present time on the Black Warrior and Mississippi Rivers?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will tell the gentleman. The evidence shows that it is true that we sold the equipment from the Erie Canal, as the gentleman says, but so far as the evidence indicates we have not received any real money for it yet, although we hope to. The Government proposes to continue to operate its steamer or barge line on the Mississippi River and on the Black Warrior River in Alabama. The operation of the Mississippi River line is proceeding at a profit to the Government. The operation of the Black Warrior line is being continued at a loss to the Government, but it is continued in the authorization in this bill for the reason that it should be on a paying basis, and would be on a paying basis, if the railroads of the State of Alabama treated the Government barge line as they should. For instance, on freight from New Orleans to Birmingham, practically 90 per cent of the haul is on the Government barge or the Government steamer, and the short haul of about 10 per cent is on the railroad; yet the railroad is permitted to demand and receive about 85 per cent of the total freight charge. A case was brought by the Government two years ago to remedy that, which case is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SNELL. How are you going to get away from that proposition?

Mr. ANTHONY. We asked them, "Why in the world has not the Government insisted on a show-down for a proper prorating of that freight rate? You say you started a suit two years ago, and you have not any ruling on it." Of course we were very indignant, thinking that the Interstate Commerce Commission were possibly at fault. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] took it up with Mr. Esch, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who was formerly a Member of this House, and found out that it was true that the War Department had had a case pending there for the past two years, but the case had been continued from time to time on request of the War Department. Civilian attorneys who had been employed were evidently more interested in prolonging the litigation than in bringing it to a show-down. But I think that both the War Department and the Interstate Commerce Commission are open to censure for failing to bring to a decision as important a matter as that, and I believe that with a proper prorating of rates with the railroads the Black Warrior line might pay.

Mr. MANN. Surely the gentleman does not mean to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission is subject to censure for not acting on a case that is not brought to an issue before it by the attorneys in the case; because no court and no semijudicial body proceeds to inflict hara-kiri where the parties agree to continue the case.

Mr. ANTHONY. This case on its face shows an injustice and a wrong on the part of the railroads, and the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to assume the right to correct a wrong of that kind.

Mr. MANN. If both sides to a lawsuit ask to have it continued, it is not the duty of the court to examine the case without the aid of counsel in order to instruct the counsel what they ought to do.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but the gentleman knows about the law's delays. The gentleman has heard about the delays of the law, and the people are very impatient about it.

Mr. MANN. I have heard about the delays of lawyers. It is not fair to criticize the court because lawyers delay a case.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ROACH. Has not the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to correct this manifestly unfair rate, independent of any case that may be pending before it?

Mr. ANTHONY. As I have stated, this case is pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has been delayed two years for various reasons, and I think the Interstate Commerce Commission has the right to make a decision to-morrow, and that it ought to make it, regardless of how the lawyers try to delay it.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Is it not a fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission appointed a special examiner to take testimony and report on this case—that it has been pending 14 months?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. And they appointed a special examiner who has had the case under advisement for over a year and has just made a report, and is not it a fact that the original rates were approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission—the original rates fixed by the railroad?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that is also true.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. There was a barge line running from Baltimore to New Bern, N. C. Has that been discontinued?

Mr. ANTHONY. That has been discontinued, and the equipment sold.

Mr. HILL. In such approved projects as deepening of channels and the maintenance of channels, at the ports at Baltimore and other places, I understand that is in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that if you get a favorable decision in this case with reference to the Black Warrior River, there is freight available to more than make up the losses.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is our impression. And I think it applies not only to the Black Warrior but to the Ohio and the Mississippi and all other of the more important waterway systems; if they can get the proper treatment in the matter of rates the water lines will be self-sustaining.

Now, this bill makes appropriation for the national soldiers' homes. Under the existing conditions as the committee found them it is unable to make an intelligent estimate as to the appropriations necessary for the conduct of those homes for the next year from the fact that there are 3,500 men of the last war in the Veterans' Bureau being taken care of at the soldiers' homes. The soldiers' homes are receiving approximately $3 a day each, or $9,000 a day revenue. That is almost half of what it costs the Government to maintain the soldiers at the Public Health hospitals and other hospitals, and nevertheless under existing conditions we find that the soldiers' homes authorities are using the Veterans' Bureau fund to augment all the different items for which we appropriate in this bill. Therefore the committee has had no way to ascertain the definite sum that we should give for definite purposes. We thought of placing a limitation in the bill on the funds from the Veterans' Bureau going to certain items where it is the view of the committee that they should not go, such items as ordinary expenses and overhead for the various homes.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the money paid in by the Veterans' Bureau is used by different homes without its going into the Treasury?

Mr. ANTHONY. Without any further action by Congress in directing how the money shall be expended. The committee was concerned over that. We tried to write a limitation which would direct that the money go into the Treasury so that Congress could appropriate directly the necessary amount for the conduct of the homes, but we found that under existing law we could not do it and the legislation would be subject to a point of order if we did. But it is a situation that the House ought to know about, and it is a situation that ought to be corrected, because it is manifestly unbusinesslike to permit such a use of public money.

Mr. STEPHENS. Under whose direction are the national soldiers' homes now being conducted?

Mr. ANTHONY. Under a board of managers appointed by this body, of which Gen. George H. Wood, of Ohio, is president.

Mr. STEPHENS. Does not the gentleman think that these national soldiers' homes ought to be taken away from Congress and put under some particular head, so that they can be properly managed?

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman wants to know my personal view, when I came to Congress 13 years ago I introduced just such a bill and have introduced it four or five times since, but I never got anywhere with it. I agree with the gentleman that the homes should be operated by the War Department. But I want to say that they are well managed now and the committee can find no place for serious criticism.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In regard to the rivers and harbors, the Bureau of the Budget, as I understand it, cut down the estimates that had been submitted by the Army engineers from $42,000,000 to $27,000,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Did the subcommittee conducting the hearings consider the proposition of increasing the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget to the original estimate of the Army engineers, $42,000,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee did not; it felt that in a matter of that kind it was not warranted in making such a large increase.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The reason I ask is that there is a considerable sentiment among the membership of the House that the Bureau of the Budget made a grievous mistake, and as one Member of the House I would like to have had the committee go into it.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is double the appropriation made last year, but I think it is the information of the committee that more money could be spent on rivers and harbors than the amount appropriated.

Mr. BOND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BOND. It is not true that there was more money in the surplus fund last year, and that therefore the funds available will be less this year?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is quite correct; the $27,000,000 will be the only money spent for river and harbor work during the coming year.

Mr. BOND. Is it not further true that the Army engineers originally estimated $60,000,000 and then cut the amount down to what they thought was a minimum—$40,000,000—and that then the Budget cut the amount down to $27,000,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is a correct statement.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it not also true that in respect to this great work, which is necessary for the whole country and its prosperity, after economizing for some years on account of the war, we have actually less money for the work than we have had at any time in the past?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that is true. The last item in the bill is for the Panama Canal. The appropriation for the current year was $9,000,000. The committee has reported four million and some hundred thousand dollars for the operation of the canal for the current year. The report of the canal officials is very gratifying. It shows that there has been a surplus of two and one-half million dollars turned into the Treasury as excess of tolls during the past year over the expense of operation. Of course this does not take into account the interest on the original investment, but it shows a very gratifying increase in the business of the canal and a promise that from now on it is going to pay its own way. The committee was able to get these radical reductions in the appropriations for the maintenance of the canal through the recommendations of the governor of the Canal Zone, Col. Morrow, who in his estimate proposed, first, that he would save $1,000,000 from the cost of the operation last year by utilizing $1,000,000 of previously appropriated money which he had not expended, and the appropriations for the Canal Zone are available until expended. Next he reduced the forces, which would take up approximately another million dollars. He abandoned also certain approved works of construction, thereby making a saving of another million dollars, and then, instead of asking for the money necessary to augment his stock of supplies, he proposed to use out of existing supplies almost another million, enabling the Congress to reduce the total appropriation to four million and odd dollars. The governor said that he foresaw a year ago the necessity for economy and has been preparing for it; and he has enabled us, therefore, to make the reduction in the appropriation which we present to you.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Would the gentleman mind discussing the salaries paid the employees in the Canal Zone, and stating whether under this reduction there will be less Americans employed and more natives?

Mr. ANTHONY. The information which the committee received was to the effect that undoubtedly the force of men in the Canal Zone will be further reduced from time to time. As the work is more and more completed the necessity for a large force of men, of course, diminishes. It is believed that by utilizing more silver labor, which means native labor, they can dispense with a good deal of the gold labor, which means the American labor. They are doing that wherever it can be done to advantage.

The labor conditions on the canal are not satisfactory. We find that the men are very much dissatisfied with reductions which have been made in their pay, and other things. Formerly they had nothing to pay for rent, light, heat, or anything of that kind, and now under a recent ruling they are charged a reasonable amount for light, heat, fuel, rent, and they object very strenuously to that. The men are paid upon the basis of a 25 per cent increase over what the same grade of labor receives in the United States, so that the committee believes they are well paid, but the committee feels that perhaps the men in the Canal Zone do not appreciate the fact that labor in the United States is no longer receiving the high scale of wages it received during the war period.

Mr. LAZARO. In this connection, in the event you cut down your white or American laborers and depend on the native laborers, in case of emergency, would it not be a drawback to us?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not believe there is any danger of their depleting the white labor in the skilled or mechanical grades to any great extent, but they can utilize the native labor in many places where they are not doing it now.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of the record and general information, what were the total receipts of the Panama Canal?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have not the figures, but approximately $11,000,000.

Mr. LAYTON. And the total expenditures?

Mr. ANTHONY. Approximately $9,000,000.

Mr. LAYTON. And the total appropriations carried are, in round numbers, $4,000,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. Four million dollars; and we are enabled to make this saving by means of resorting to the things I enumerated.

Mr. LAYTON. If we deduct the amount of money received from tolls paid by American shipping, how would that $9,000,000 be affected?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not give the gentleman that information, but the committee did find one very serious situation in regard to canal tolls that ought to be remedied. This House tried to remedy it by passing a bill a year ago. The bill went to the Senate and certain interested parties there have prevented the passage of the legislation. In other words, we are losing about $2,000,000 worth of tolls now because of the method used for measuring the tonnage of vessels under the present system. Under the present system we measure only the tonnage below the decks.

Mr. LAYTON. Does that advantage accrue to American ships?

Mr. ANTHONY. It accrues almost entirely to foreign ships engaged in carrying lumber from the northwest coast to the eastern coast. The lumber is largely carried on upper decks, and, of course, it escapes measurement, and the ships get away without paying their full tonnage.

Mr. LAYTON. Of course, the chairman of the committee has not gone into the question of free tolls for the Panama Canal for American shipping?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is one thing that we overlooked.

I want to apologize to the House for taking up so much of its time in explanation of this bill, but gentlemen will agree with me that it is a very large measure. I can not close without testifying to the great obligations I am under to the other members of the subcommittee who did so much to help perfect the bill that is now before you. Mr. STAFFORD, of Wisconsin, was indefatigable in his labors.

We had the benefit of the wide military experience of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON]. We had the benefit of the wide knowledge of fortifications of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] through his previous service in the making up of the fortifications bill, and I feel under eternal obligation to my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], the ranking member of the minority on the subcommittee, for the great aid that he brought to the committee in the make-up of this bill, and I want to recommend him to the Congress as the best type of economist I have ever seen in all my congressional experience. [Applause.] His is a service of great value to the taxpayer.

A MEMBER. On the Democratic side?

Mr. ANTHONY. On both sides of this House. He seems constantly to have in his mind not only what is best for the Government, and in the giving of advice to us on every close point he would say, "Let us decide this in favor of the people back home." [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman, in answer to a question propounded by me in the beginning of his remarks, said the committee proposed to reduce the officers in the Pershing bill. Did he mean the present Army bill or the one now before the Committee on Military Affairs and not yet passed?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Pershing bill has, I understand, been considered by the House Committee on Military Affairs, and that bill provides for a reduction to 12,000 from 13,000, which we now have, and also there is an authorization for an increase a year later back to 14,000.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the gentleman from Texas? If he will notice House bill 10271 from the Committee on Military Affairs, it follows the first suggestion of the War Department, or the Pershing bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has yielded the floor. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield time to the gentleman from Maryland? The gentleman from Kansas has used 1 hour and 54 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know that I can add much, if any, information in reference to this bill in addition to that which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], the chairman, has called to your attention in his address. He has made a very full and clear explanation of this bill. It has required a great deal of very hard labor to make it up. I have worked on many appropriation bills since I have been a Member of Congress, but there has been more painstaking and diligent service spent upon this bill than any bill that I have been connected with. The committee has given more than three months of painstaking toil in working out the details of this bill. The chairman has been eminently fair and has given to this task that splendid ability which he is able to give to a question when he is interested in it, and the crowning virtue of his service is that I do not believe there has been in his heart or in his soul one particle of partisan politics in making up this bill. In fact, it is extremely doubtful whether or not an onlooker could have decided who was a Republican or who a Democrat in making up this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Has not that been true in all bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SISSON. That is true, so far as I know, on all bills from this committee, and I want to say to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that a Democrat would be going some to be a better economist and to more faithfully follow political promises of economy than has been the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. [Applause.] I feel sure that if there were a matter in which I was interested, he would not stop to ascertain what section of the country was to be benefited; he would simply want to know about the merits of the item. In his services up to date as chairman of this great committee he has shown that splendid fairness, notwithstanding the fact that he is as partisan a Republican as I am a partisan Democrat, that causes him to lose all partisanship in the Committee on Appropriations, and especially in considering items of appropriation bills. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to not only the thanks of his own party but the thanks of the membership on both sides of the aisle and the taxpayers of the entire country for the splendid service which he has rendered. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] gave, as he always does, very patient attention to the details of this bill. We also had the assistance of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], who has had service on the Committee on Military Affairs, and the knowledge he gained on that committee has been invaluable to the subcommittee in making up the bill. I think it fair to state that the subcommittee had a most difficult task, because I think one of the most difficult things for Congress to undertake to do is to make appropriations under the Army reorganization act so that it can control the expenditure of the items of appropriation. It is the most remarkably bad piece of legislation enacted since the Civil War, if not the most remarkably bad piece of legislation ever enacted in a free government. The people of America little dream how bad this reorganization bill is. It is wonderful in that no mind can conceive of one that is worse. It is so wonderfully drawn that it is next to impossible for Congress to control the expenditure of a dollar under its terms. The whole bill is drawn for the sole benefit of the Army officers. It is drawn by one familiar with and wedded to the German military system. The best thing this Congress could do would be to repeal this law.

That bill was so wonderfully drawn that the General Staff and the Secretary of War in apportioning these appropriations may make a perfectly fair apportionment and so write it in the appropriation bill and thus meet the entire approval of Congress and then after getting the money, if they desired for any reason to divert funds along activities of their own choosing, they could take it out of the items for feeding the Army, food and clothing, and use it for other purposes, and thus under this law create a deficiency and come to Congress and ask for $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 more money than Congress intended they should have and under the remarkable Army reorganization bill spend what they please. We have done the best we could to try to regulate the expenditure of all of the money in this bill by limitations on the items of appropriation, and as bad as the law is the committee has accomplished this within the rules of the House. We have, for example, endeavored so to limit the expenditure of this money that Congress will be able to control the size of the Army. That could not be done except by limitation, so that we will be able to control the expenditure so that money appropriated to feed the Army shall not be used for other purposes. In other words, we made an effort to put in this bill provisions which would enable the appropriating body, the body representing the people, to control the purse strings. Now, that has been quite a task, and it has not been without great labor that we were able to accomplish this.

Right here, Mr. Chairman, I desire to pause for a moment and State a few principles of government, lest we forget. The Army officials do not like any sort of restrictions or limitations upon their rights and powers to spend money. They would hark to the dead centuries of the past and reestablish the old system of government, with the Army in the ascendancy. In former years, before the Declaration of Independence, it was considered the function and the duty of the masses of the people to supply the demands of those in official life, so that those in office could take from the people just what they desired and appropriate just what they saw fit and proper for their own ease and comfort and for their own benefit, rather than for the benefit of the people. That viewpoint has been entirely changed. Now, I hold that the Government should serve the people and not the people the Government. But the reorganization act—that act of the General Staff; this so-called Kahn law—is the reincarnation of the old, ancient, and medieval idea that the chief purpose and function of government is to bring unwilling people under its domain for the benefit solely of the ones in authority. Why, Mr. Chairman, this idea is being discarded everywhere except with the General Staff of the Army and our Military Affairs Committee. The life tenure and retirement features of this law are as bad as any feudal system England or Europe ever had.

Governments in the past have been so conducted that the majority of the people have worked for the small minority. Our fathers thought that they had established a Government where this condition would never exist. They never dreamed that a Congress under our Constitution would ever turn back to the old feudal tenures in office, and that, too, under the guise of national defense. Yet that is what has been accomplished in this most wonderful law under which we are now living. The best thing Congress could do would be to repeal this law at once.

We can now boast of our lords. We now have our royal families and exclusive sets. You see them everywhere around here. They are in uniform and all wear English belts and shoulder straps, some, boots and spurs. All other nations are busy getting rid of theirs at this time and are happy at the riddance. We are just establishing ours. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be misunderstood. Our Army officers are a fine lot of fellows. They are men of ability and honor. They are not to blame. I blame Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that I am in no wise governed or influenced in my judgment by any prejudice in this matter. I must admit, however, that I feel very deeply on this question. When I look abroad over this, the fairest country on the globe, and see so much suffering, so much poverty, such a shortage of money, and such a heavy burden of taxes, I confess that I get impatient of this persistent effort on the part of those who secured Army positions on account of the war now using every device known to man to hold on and thus continue this burden, which is so heavy that our people can not bear it much longer. Congress alone can protect the taxpayer, and Congress can not unless it has courage and is willing to cut these appropriations and cut deep.

Now, in reference to military activities in our Government, I want to say that we must never lose sight of the fact that the Army is always, except in time of war, to be absolutely subservient to the civil authorities. Governments should not exist for the benefit of armies or army officers. Under our theory of government, army officers ought not to assume control of the country.

In time of peace the Army should be absolutely subservient to all the civilian peace officers. Government does not exist for the benefit of Army or Army officers. The purpose of an army under our system of government is to aid and assist the civil authorities in enforcing the law, enforcing the laws made by the Congress of the United States and those made in various State legislatures when called upon by the governors to do so, and in time of peace it is only a part of the police force of the country, to be called into action when the civil police can not control the situation. Let us keep that constantly in mind, because all the republics in the past have been destroyed by reason of the fact that the glamor of military life was attractive to them and the military authorities assumed control of affairs and subverted the civil authorities in time of war, and they were never able to restore the republic or government which they had prior to the time the military assumed control. There is nothing that history teaches so clearly as that you must fear constantly the encroachment of the military over the civil authority. Why, the Kaiser himself realized that, accepting as he did and his father before did the doctrine of Treitschke, who made the military theory popular in Germany at the beginning through the educational channel, offering every boy in Germany an education at the expense of the German Government, and acting under this theory every school in Germany became and was a part of the military establishment, requiring young men, when they reached a certain age, to attend these military schools. The German Emperor thought in this manner to protect his power and perpetuate his family in power. But this did not save him or his government.

In every school all the students had instilled into their minds the military theory of government and that Germany, the greatest military country on earth, with the Kaiser at its head, was destined to world dominion. The burden became great and the taxation heavy. And the very instrumentality of the Treitschke and the Bismarckian theory, accepted by the German Government, became the unmaking of the German Empire.

We need not lay the flattering unction to our souls that the allied forces, even after the United States had gotten into that conflict, overcame the German military power, because that is not the truth. The experts believed it would continue for at least two years longer than it did. They had not calculated upon the German Army and the German people not being loyal to the Kaiser. You say, Have you any authority for that? Yes. What is the authority? Oh, consult the hearings in the Military Affairs Committee; go and consult the hearings before he Appropriations Committee; and you will find it was felt by European military experts, as well as our own, that it would be at least 12 months before we could reach the peak of the offensive, and we were making arrangements for the offensive to begin about 12 months from the date the armistice was signed. The Chauteau-Thierry fight changed the whole order of things. It was not the military prowess of the Allies which brought about the destruction of Germany and caused the German Emperor to flee his country. What was it? Men had guns in their hands in Germany who did not believe in the militarism of Germany or the Kaiser's government. They were tired of being governed by an army. The burden was heavy. This was their first opportunity to get rid of this hateful burden.

The Kaiser was by this very instrumentality, upon which he confidently relied, compelled to flee his own country, and he is now living apart from his own country and is afraid to go back. What was it that destroyed the Russian Empire? The thing they thought would save Russia was the thing that destroyed it. Now, it was months after the Czar was dead before the people of the world knew it. What was it that caused his overthrow? Those people in Russia did not own the lands and most of them did not own any sort of property. The ruling class thought to keep that Government superimposed upon the people of Russia by military force. But in this great world conflict the people of Russia for the first time got into their hands precious guns. The millions of Russian peasants got guns in their hands for the first time. It is true he knew little about handling it. But when he got the precious gun in his hand he soon learned to use it and he made up his mind he would never surrender it until that Government that had so long oppressed him was absolutely destroyed. I never want Americans to lay the flattering unction to their souls that they can preserve this Republic by armies and navies. It can not be done. In other words, a government is no stronger than the love of the people for that government. Public sentiment must support and sustain the government or it will fall.

Mr. Carlyle, in his history of the French Revolution, in substance said that, prior to the breaking out of the French Revolution, there would be a little uprising in some portion of France, and a few Frenchmen with little uniforms and with nice little caps on their heads would appear with little pieces of iron pipe, with some little black substance in it that would, with smoke, roll a little leaden pellet out that would seek the life of those to whom it was directed. On these iron pipes there were little toothpicks, and there was a piece of wood along the iron pipe. He said that these Frenchmen, with their little caps and uniforms and iron pipes with wood stocks and with toothpicks on the end, would rush over and put down the uprising. The uprisings continued to multiply in spite of the number of little uniforms, and the number of little iron pipes, with toothpicks on the end of them. And thus it continued for a long time, and the King relied upon the uniforms, caps, and iron pipes. But Carlyle, as he frequently does, with a dash, says, "But what can poor France do now when all France is one belching volcano? What can these little men now do with their little iron pipes with little toothpicks on the ends of them, and with little wooden stocks and a little black substance that makes puffs of smoke that roll little pellets out?" He says, "The people of France go and take from these men in the uniforms with their bare hands these little things with holes in them and toothpicks on their ends."

In other words, Carlyle, philosopher as he was, is endeavoring to convince the reader that we must rely upon something besides arms and armies to preserve liberty and preserve the Government. And we have got to do that thing here. We must rely upon the love of the people to support the Government. I have no patience with the idea that we have got to burden people with taxation to build up great armies to preserve your liberty and mine. On the contrary, this was what was said by both Republican and Democratic Parties when we were seeking election in the last campaign: "We will reduce taxation. We pledge you that we will remove this burden if elected." You Republicans won overwhelmingly. On every platform and on every stump every Republican orator criticized Democratic extravagance and pledged himself to rigid economy. Did you mean it? Are you going to make good? I am here to help you, and I will vote for every reasonable reduction that is proposed. I have always stood for and worked for economy, as everyone here knows. Let us take from the backs of the people this heavy burden.

Now, there are, in my judgment, two places where you can really practice great economy and make a great saving, and that is in the Army and in the Navy. Your subcommittee has acted with a unanimity most remarkable in its effort to carry that into effect. I have endeavored to do everything in my power; in fact, I have tried to go further than our Republican friends were willing to go with me. I do not believe that we would make any mistake if we were to reduce this Army down to 75,000 men. In fact, I am going to offer an amendment to reduce it down to 100,000 men.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Can you not put that at 75,000? It looks to me as though that were big enough.

Mr. SISSON. I will say to my friend that if I thought that 75,000 men would be agreed to I would be very glad to offer that. As my friend has raised the question of 75,000 men, I will tell you what I believe would be the best thing to do in my judgment. You have got to have a little trading stock with the Senate, and if I were chairman of the committee and wanted to reduce the Army to 100,000 I would insist on 75,000 here, and then the Senate will put 150,000 in the bill, and in conference I would let the bill fail before I would go above 100,000. If you will put the number in this bill at 75,000 men, you will come nearer getting 100,000 men than you would do otherwise.

If you will bring home those troops that are now in Germany on the Rhine, and bring not less than 7,000 of the 14,000 now in the Philippines back home, and bring back half of what you have at Panama and in Hawaii—and that is what the Army officials say they are going to do—then you will have more men in continental United States with a 100,000 Army than you have now with 139,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I notice in the newspapers lately that our French and English brethren are insisting that they ought to take all the reparations money and not pay the expenses of what army we do have in Germany. Does it not strike the gentleman as a very good policy under the circumstances to bring home all those men?

Mr. SISSON. I agree with my friend. I would like to bring every American soldier out of Germany.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If we are not only not going to be paid for keeping them there, but in addition they are going to be the cause of international friction, why leave any of them there?

Mr. SISSON. I do not think it is necessary to keep any of them there, but I am not going to say arbitrarily or didactically that I am in favor of briging them home without qualification, because I imagine our State Department and those officials of ours that deal with our foreign relations know more about that than I do. But were I to consult my own personal view alone I would say we should bring them all home at once.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not wish to raise any embarrassing question——

Mr. SISSON. Oh, it does not embarrass me——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But, after all, Congress ought to appropriate for these men, and unless there are some representations made to your committee by the War Department that they should be kept there, why keep them there?

Mr. SISSON. I am not divulging any secret in the hearings, but the officials tell us that they are going to bring them home without any "ifs" or "ands." I am heartily in favor of that.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman understands, as we all do, that it is immaterial where our soldiers are stationed, whether in our country here at home or in our insular possessions; they have to be paid just the same. Now, if it is a fact that the German Government is paying the expenses of our troops in Germany, it would be economy to leave them remain in Germany, would it not?

Mr. SISSON. Unfortunately, that is not true. Unfortunately, they are not paying anything. They owe us at this time $241,000,000, to be exact. If we had not taken so many of them away, the bill would have gone up to over $300,000,000 by this time.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would be glad to see all of them brought home. But as a matter of economy, if the Germans are not going to pay for them, we should bring them home at once.

Mr. SISSON. Well, if the gentleman thinks we do not need them at home, why not leave them all over there?

Mr. McKENZIE. I would bring them home.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I would bring them home, so that when you add them to the force we have here now you could then dispense with 15,000 surplus here, and 100,000 men would be really a greater number than we now have in continental United States.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS. Do the boys themselves want to come home?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know. If they want to stay in Germany after they are discharged rather than return to the United States let them stay. They are free men and can stay where they please.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. How many have we in Germany?

Mr. SISSON. My information is that 7,000 was the number that we had there last. The number has varied at different dates. I think at the beginning of this year it was 11,000, and now it has been reduced to 7,000. It is somewhere around 7,000 now.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Mississippi tell us what the status of these troops is—American troops in a foreign country with which we are at peace?

Mr. SISSON. They are doing guard duty under the agreement that was had at the time of the signing of the armistice with reference to policing Germany, and I understand the German people prefer to have that guard duty done largely by American troops.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I have heard that same statement made before, but what is the authority for it? Has there been any official agreement of that kind or any official communication, or is that merely a rumor?

Mr. SISSON. There was an official agreement made with Germany in regard to the policing of the Rhine territory.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The terms of the armistice, as well as the Versailles treaty, provided that Germany should bear all the cost of military occupation. But the United States is not a party to the Versailles treaty. We concluded a separate treaty.

Mr. SISSON. You are going into a field that our committee did not go into. It is as much as we can do to provide for the maintenance of the Army. We do not intend to let them starve. They are a part of the Army. The gentleman would appropriate for them, would he not?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I certainly would appropriate for them, but I want to inquire what they are doing over there?

Mr. SISSON. They are doing guard duty; they are doing what they are directed by their superior officers to do.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. My complaint is not at the soldiers, but why are they directed to stay there?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know, except that under the agreement made at the time by the high contracting parties the United States Government was to perform that duty. There is another committee that handles all those matters. I feel that we are perfectly justified in reducing the size of the Army to 100,000, because in time of real war 115,000 men will not amount to anything; that is, the 15,000 extra would not amount to anything in real war. We can, however, save several million dollars by cutting off the 15,000. Then I would not only cut 115,000 men down to 100,000 men, but I would cut the officers from 11,000 down to 9,000. In fact, if I thought I could succeed I would cut them down more than that. I will vote for the very smallest number that I think we can pass through this House.

In my judgment, however, if you should keep 115,000 men, 9,000 officers are ample and more than ample. If I had my way about it there would not be more than 5,000 officers kept on the pay roll of the Government. But I do not want to go below the figures which would give us a reasonable number of officers to train the men in the event that we needed trained men for another war. But we examined the officers before us, and they said that for the next 10 years we would have an available supply of trained young men from 20 to as high as 25 years of age who would be perfectly fitted for military service for 10 years, already trained, and have had more training than even in those countries where they have universal military training, for of that number thousands have seen actual training in the field, which is the best training a man can have.

With all these things confronting me, I feel warranted in asking Congress to reduce the Army to 100,000 men, and in this time, when the condition of the country is so bad financially, when State, county, municipal, and Federal taxes are so burdensome, every dollar that we can take off of the bended back of the taxpayer is a great help and delight to the country. I do not believe you are going to have complete rehabilitation of business until these heavy burdens of taxation are reduced. And, gentlemen, the way to reduce these burdens is to courageously reduce taxes like you would in your own private business, rather than to go into the bankruptcy court.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. TINCHER. I agree with the gentleman that if we reduce the number of the Regular Army to 100,000 or 150,000 men, it would not affect war particularly. I understand it is claimed by the department that if you reduce the Army down to the point where the committee has reduced it, it will disturb the organization, the so-called skeleton of the Army. What is the gentleman's opinion about that, in view of his amendment to reduce it to 100,000?

Mr. SISSON. I am glad the gentleman from Kansas has mentioned that fact, because a year ago Congress was wrecking the whole Army, just ruining it, as our Army officers said when we reduced it to 150,000 men, and yet Congress almost unanimously did it. I have not heard a word of complaint about the size of the Army since that was done; it does not seem to be wrecked.

At that time we needed four or five times as many in Germany as we now have and four or five times as many on the Mexican border and the Philippine Islands. Now, if the conference just closed here in Washington amounts to anything we certainly can save some money by a radical reduction in the present Army. That is the reason why it was called. We are going to bring the troops out of Germany, cut down the force in the Philippines, Hawaii, and the Panama Canal. Yet you hear a wail from the General Staff that we are again wrecking the Army because we are putting it down to 115,000. All you gentlemen know that is mere back-yard talk for the purpose of influencing your votes and keeping their occupation. I know these Army officers are splendid fellows and I like them all. They are men of honesty and integrity, but, bless your soul, Old-man Taxpayer and Old-man People, whose servant you are, want to know what good purpose such a great number serve. They walk around with boots, spurs, and shoulder straps and look beautiful, but the people of this country are wanting to know what real service the boots and spurs are doing. Now, many of these officers are good friends of mine. They differ with me about their number. I do not blame them.

I ran up against one general before the Appropriations Committee, and he naturally took the military side of it. He flared up and said, "I have got just as much patriotism as you." I said, "I know you have, but the difference is you look at it from the standpoint of a general and I am looking from the standpoint of the people. If you did not take the view that you do you ought to have your uniform stripped off." I feel the same way, that if the officer was not proud of his uniform, did not think it was the most important position a man could hold in the Government, he ought to get out. It is our duty, however, to do the thinking. What makes me tired is that some Congressmen refuse to do any thinking at all. You leave it to Government experts, and when the majority do, this Government will not last as long as a paper collar in a fight. Any lawyer knows what you can do with experts. You have a case and you want to prove that a person died from poison. You can get the experts to prove that the person died of poison and you can find the poison, and on the other side you can get experts to prove that there was no poison at all.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. TINCHER. I understand my friend to say that the skeleton of the Army that they talk about is to have sufficient privates to furnish employment for all the officers. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. That is the purpose of the private. The officers must have something to practice on, and incidentally somebody to wait on them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman base his philosophy on the fact that you must have only officers for the number of enlisted men in the Army.

Mr. SISSON. To a certain extent; certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. To how certain an extent?

Mr. SISSON. You must have a certain complement of officers for the enlisted men, and then you must have a certain number to put their feet up on the desk and do the clerical duties, and then you would have to have a small number at the schools to teach the boys in the military schools how to be social.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not the gentleman have the idea that a part of the policy of the present military law and of the one that obtained before it is that a part of the professional Army shall be employed in the teaching of civilian organizations and institutions and agencies, so that we will not have to maintain a large standing Army, and so that we will have better trained men to call to the colors in any war emergency?

Mr. SISSON. That is a mighty beautiful theory, and a theory to which at first everyone is very much attracted, but when we reflect and consult the figures and the real cost of this training, unless a limit is placed upon the amount and kind of training, it is cheaper in the long run to have a big standing Army than it is to have these training schools all over the country. They are beginning to talk now and insisting seriously about putting all these technical units into the schools and civilian training camps. They say they want to make them all-around soldiers. My own personal view is that in training civilians and the National Guard we ought to train them to be foot soldiers, to be infantrymen, and that the technical units, like the Air Service, the tank service, and the chemical warfare service ought to be specialized and only kept in the Regular Army, and not maintained in the schools and National Guard.

In my judgment, the only thing we ought to maintain in time of peace is a sufficient number of officers to keep up with the world, to keep up with what is going on, and not carry too many of these various technical units in time of peace. Let me show you. Take our National Guard. It will cost practically as much to keep a cavalryman in the National Guard as it will to keep a cavalryman in the Regular Army. You have got to have the same horse. You will have one man to take care of a certain number of horses—the rule is 1 man to 32 horses. You have got to furnish a stable for them. The only difference is that the Regular Army would be called upon to use the horses every day, but an hour or so two or three times a week is the only time that the horses will be used by the National Guard.

I agree with the chairman of this subcommittee that that is impracticable. He has one of these training camps out in his community and the farmers and taxpayers say, "Why are you keeping all of these hundreds of horses here? These boys come and ride them about an hour or two a week, and the balance of the time the Government is feeding them, and they have caretakers and men to curry them and look after them. It is a useless expense." Now, take the tank service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is the gentleman quite correct in what he says about the use of cavalry horses in the National Guard?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Do they maintain one horse for every man all through the troops?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that that is absolutely true, but it is practically true in the Cavalry units of the National Guard.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; it is not.

Mr. SISSON. It is practically true, unless the testimony is altogether untrue.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. They rent part of the horses for the period that they use them.

Mr. SISSON. It is just as bad when you rent them. I know something about renting horses. When you rent a horse the man who owns the horse makes a profit on the horse. The man is a fool who will rent a horse for less than it takes to keep him and pay the overhead charge. Of course, the gentleman knows that I did not mean that the Government owned a horse for every member of the National Guard. I only said that the Government furnished horses for the mounted units.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman admit that they do not maintain a full complement for mounted organizations, horses eating their heads off?

Mr. SISSON. I know they do not purchase a horse for every man. They rent part of them. Does the gentleman know why they do not purchase? The reason they do not is because this Committee on Appropriations declined to give them the money. They would be glad to do it if we would give them the money to do it. It is not because they do not want to do it. It is not because they do not argue that it would be a good thing to be done. It is only because we decline to give them the money. They claim that the horses also ought to be trained.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The Committee on Appropriations have had jurisdiction now for 12 months. The Committee on Military Affairs used to have jurisdiction of this appropriation bill, and I do not recall when it was recommended by the War Department that they should keep full riding complements for the mounted troops.

Mr. SISSON. But all these specialized units have come in since the World War. You did not have any tank service. You had no chemical warfare service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am talking about mounted troops, not about the tank service.

Mr. SISSON. I am talking about these expensive units. It was contended at one time that Cavalry would be useless. Now they are not. We went into that question about the usefulness of Cavalry.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The Army never contended that Cavalry would be useless.

Mr. SISSON. Some of the Army officers have.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am talking about the General Staff.

Mr. SISSON. I have never seen anything that the General Staff was not for. I have never seen anything that tended to aggrandize the Army that the General Staff was not for. I may be wrong, but these are my views, and I am expressing them frankly.

Now, your subcommittee felt that we ought not to maintain these expensive units in the National Guard and that we ought not to maintain horses and equipment and men to take care of them in time of peace for the purpose of training these units. It makes the military forces too expensive in this country.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. My understanding from the testimony was that these units were maintained.

Mr. SISSON. What units?

Mr. HARRISON. These units in the National Guard training corps.

Mr. SISSON. Some of them were maintained, and they wanted to increase them, but we did not give them the money to increase them. We do not intend to give them the money to increase them.

I know that there are certain men in the House now who are as strongly militaristic as men ever were in Germany. They are good, honest, and fine men. However, because I have not one idea like that in my make-up, I can not help but be vigorously opposed to anything that tends to make out of this Republic a military camp. [Applause.] There is another thing that I had not intended to mention, but in view of the turn of affairs in this debate I will say that to my mind the most dangerous wedge after this war is over that our staff and officers are seeking to drive into this country is to try to get hold of the schools. When you begin to appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury to the schools throughout the country you are going to find that all of the professors, all of the trustees, every man who wants Federal money, are going to use the military arm of the various institutions as a means of getting money out of the Treasury, and fires will be built under Congressmen and Senators to get more money for this purpose. For a fellow like me it will take a good big fire. [Laughter.] I do not believe we should go too far.

On the other hand, I am willing that men may volunteer for military service, but I am utterly unwilling that it should be the policy of the Government to expend its money and have the officers offering to all of the schools of this country military training so as to make out of our boys soldiers, universally, because you can not take a boy, in my judgment, and put him through a few years of training, and when he is about 16 put a uniform on him and put a gun in his hand without in a few years making a militarist out of him. I do not believe that is the proper thing to do. I know that I am not in accord with the sentiment of many people in the House; I know that I am not in accord with that great crowd of people who contend that we want to build up a civilian army that will cost nothing. An army that costs nothing, of course, does not exist. Go look at the hearings and see what they want to put in these Reserve Officers' Training Corps units, and why they have held on like grim death to all of this surplus military material. It is in order that they might control it and put it in these various units in making a soldier out of a man in private life.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I heard the statement of the chairman, Mr. ANTHONY, this morning, in which he stated that in his judgment the Cavalry would fall into disuse in the Army. I have heard the gentleman's statement in connection with Cavalry for the National Guard, and I would ask the gentleman in that connection, what was the position of the committee on the proposition of keeping the War Department embarked in the business of improving the breed of horses by buying up old stallions and having them taken all over the country for the purpose of improving horses, when, as a matter of fact, it seems to be the contention that we have no use for them?

Mr. SISSON. I do not think the gentleman can draw that conclusion from any statement that I have made, except that I do not believe we ought to have Cavalry in the National Guard or the State Militia, for we do believe in maintaining the Cavalry unit in the Regular Army. I do not think anyone ever wanted "old stallions taken up all over the country." But we found this item in the bill and it was the work of his own hands, not ours. If the gentleman complains of us about keeping the old stallions, I would remind him that there is a committee known as the Military Affairs Committee, of which my friend is a distinguished member, who instituted the old stallion theory, and it is a monument to the efficiency of that committee, and we hated to break it up entirely. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say not with my vote, however.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, many things happen without the gentleman's vote and without mine, because I realize that I am not the full Committee on Appropriations, and I know my friend does not feel that he is the full Military Affairs Committee. He is just a distinguished member of that, a unit of it, but we find as a result of that committee's action, notwithstanding our friend's opposition, that we have the old stallions, and we hated to turn them out and let them starve. We want to take care of them and feed them for the good they have done.

Mr. McKENZIE. I was hoping the gentleman would put in one of those limitations in the bill that no money could be used for that purpose.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, we did not want them to starve to death. We wanted to keep them. Seriously, in reference to the breeding of horses for Army purposes, in my judgment, it is a very much more economical way to do it than for the Army to undertake to breed its own horses. Not only that, the Army is under no obligation to buy any of these colts, and I must confess that while I had nothing to do with the installation of that process of getting Cavalry horses, I do not think it is a bad idea, because when the Army needs them, the farmer can get a good, reasonable price for his horses, and the Government is also protected in the price of the horse. This is the only money spent in this bill for the benefit of the farmer. If the horse is suited for military purposes, the Government gets it at a certain price.

I do not know but that it is a pretty good thing. I did not intend to discuss that matter, but I do believe the Federal Government could engage in worse things than an effort to distribute a good class of horses so that the horses are improved and when war does come there will be in the hands of the people of the United States a sufficient supply of horses for war purposes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will not the gentleman concede the same philosophy might be true among men as among horses, and that it would be a very good thing for the Government in time of peace to prepare some men for war?

Mr. SISSON. That may be true, but I do not believe that I am going to take my boy and treat him the same as I would my horse. I would not deal with my boy as I would with my hogs. I would not let a hog determine what he wanted to do with himself, but I do not object to a boy determining whether he wanted to go into military training or not; that is, I would not treat my boy as I would my horse.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Nobody has disputed that.

Mr. SISSON. I understand, but I do not want schools established all over the country where they have professors educated to the idea of having military schools, where boys can not get any schooling, just as they did in Germany, without becoming soldiers. It is a tendency that I am opposed to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You have pretty well curbed the tendency in this bill.

Mr. SISSON. Then the subcommittee has accomplished what it intended to accomplish.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Is it not a fact that the initiation of having these stallions throughout the country for the purpose of bettering the horses for Cavalry purposes came from the Agricultural Department, and was carried out by that department until the war came on, when it was then turned over to the War Department? Is it not the fact that the Agricultural Department is administering that law to-day?

Mr. SISSON. Well, I understand that there has been an appropriation carried all along in the Army bill. Jim Hay, of Virginia——

Mr. MANN. Long before the war came on.

Mr. SISSON. Long before the war came along, long before that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In the Army remount service.

Mr. SISSON. And I recall, that was about the time I came to Congress, or maybe just before, Mr. Hay of Virginia, was the ranking Democrat on the Military Affairs Committee. I am not sure but he introduced the bill. The remount service was reorganized, and there was a provision put in the bill authorizing the purchase of certain stallions. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] will recollect about it. That was in force a long time before the war.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That question came before the Committee on Agriculture, in fact when the Secretary of Agriculture was there, and they said that that was initiated in the Agricultural Department, and when the war came on it was turned over to the War Department, but as a matter of fact the Agricultural Department had the administration of the law a long time before that.

Mr. SISSON. I can not inform the gentleman where it originated——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman from Kentucky has reference to another item that used to be carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill relating to the breeding of types of horses in various parts of the country. That does not relate to the Army remount service. They were consolidated and put under the care of the War Department recently. That was not developed originally by reason of the war, and they are not to be confused with the remount service.

Mr. KINCHELOE. As a matter of fact, that item is no longer carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; it is in the War Department.

Mr. SISSON. Now, as to the number of officers. In my judgment, the number of officers we ought to retain in the service to a large extent depends upon the size of the Army. There are certain officers who are needed for purposes other than officering the actual number of men in the Army. You gentlemen are just as familiar with the service as I am, but I am sure that 9,000 officers would be sufficient, and if I have the opportunity I shall offer an amendment cutting the number of officers down to 9,000.

What I want to call your attention to especially is a matter that was referred to during the debate this morning. I must confess it looks to me as if the civilian employees, those people who are paid wages in the service in the field, are far in excess of the number that ought to be required. I would have the private soldier do a little of this work. I do not know if I offend him, but it ought not to offend him. I do know from the little investigation I have been able to give to the organization of the armies of Germany, France, England, and Japan, I find that their civilian employees are very few as compared with our own, because they require certain work and duties to be performed by the private soldier. An investigation of the Union and Confederate armies during the Civil War will show that there were certain duties which the soldiers performed which are now performed by civilians. Now, there are at the present time in the Army 49,437 civilian employees in the field service. That does not include those in the city of Washington. It does not include the clerks in the War Department. There are certain activities that are called field activities that are actually in Washington, but not very many of them—only a few hundred of those men, as I am informed—but we have 49,437 civilian employees in the field service of the Army. I realize the fact that many of those men, civilian employees, are now keeping guard over and taking care of the surplus property and the reserve property of the Army.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana was chairman of the subcommittee having charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, Mr. WASON was also a member of that committee, and I was a member of the committee. We made a very strenuous effort two years ago to ascertain the whereabouts of that surplus property, how much was in the various depots throughout the country, what there was in the city of Washington. Mr. WOOD and all the subcommittee were very anxious to know. He summoned various and sundry people to come before the committee. We were not able to find out. The fact is it is a difficult matter now to tell how much surplus the Government has on hand. We do know that millions of dollars worth of property have been permitted to go to waste and to ruin. A great deal of it has rotted; automobiles have been permitted to stay out in the open. I want to call to your attention again, lest we forget, a matter that Mr. WOOD brought to the attention of the House some years ago in reference to the number of typewriters bought and held in reserve and the number sent abroad. They ran up into the thousands upon top of thousands. We were making an effort to find out where they were. Somebody told us some were stored down here in an old garage. We went down and downstairs we could not find anything about what was upstairs. Nobody knew what was up on the two top floors. Somebody said that he thought that there was some Army stuff up there, but he said he did not know anything about it; did not know what it was. Mr. WOOD got on an elevator and told the man that he wanted him to take him up to where that Army stuff was stored.

We went up and found a typewriter repair shop and found several hundred typewriters undergoing repair. We asked if there were any more, and they said yes. We went through and found new typewriters upon top of typewriters piled up in unopened boxes, and furniture, two whole floors of it. That building must have been 150 or 200 feet long and 40 or 50 feet wide, two floors, where this stuff was. Now, I have heard from other sources that in New York, New Jersey, and all over the country there is a vast quantity of stores, and the Army has been holding on to it. That is one of the reasons they assign now why they need all these civilian employees. We all thought then and now that that stuff ought to have been sold. But our committee had no jurisdiction to authorize the sale. If we had the jurisdiction we would have required it be sold.

A great many of these civilian employees are employed in connection with river and harbor work, but that is in the Engineer Corps, and the number now in the Engineer Corps is 13,026. In the next bill, however, that is the only line of civilian employees that has been increased. In this current bill there will be 19,189, in round numbers. Of course, that may vary a little. But that is the number which, if this bill is enacted, will be actually carried.

I feel that a great reform could be accomplished here, but it is going to take some patient legislation. I may be wrong about it, but I do not believe a soldier is made a worse soldier by making him useful. Now, I do not believe he is less able, after being in the Army for some time, to perform his duty in civil life by being employed in the Army in some useful work which will save money to the taxpayers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I understood you to say your impression is that the reason they want additional civilian employees is to use these typewriters?

Mr. SISSON. I am telling you that they want employees to take care of and guard the typewriters. Now, I have no doubt there are many minds that run, like my good friend's mind runs, on typewriters rather than machines.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I was going to suggest if they would dispose of the typewriters they could dispose of the employees.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It was reported two years ago that the War Department had 100,000 typewriters on hand, and yet I notice there are many appropriations throughout this bill for typewriters. What has become of the typewriters?

Mr. SISSON. You will have to ask the Army officers, whom we have asked a hundred times. If you can get any information from them, you can do more than we have been able to do. Most of the money for typewriters in this bill is for repairs and for special types of machines.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman's experience has been like mine. I worked two years with 14 of my colleagues to find out how much surplus material there was, and we did not find out. Nobody knew. If they did know, they did not tell us.

Mr. SISSON. I think that statement is true. I think they did not know. There was so much of the stuff during the demobilization of the Army and the shifting of the people around, with not careful accounting, that they lost track of millions and millions of dollars' worth of this stuff.

Now, it will require, as I stated, some legislation. I do believe, instead of having a reorganization bill like the one we have now, if some care and attention were given to it, you might be able to render the country a great service by providing that certain things about the camp, certain activities that we are paying for now, that are done by civilian employees, be done by the soldiers.

Now, what has struck me with a great deal of force is this: That I go down to a marine camp in the Panama Canal Zone or down the Potomac River here. I do not find an army of civil employees. The men do the work. By the way, that marine camp down the Potomac River was under the control of the son of a very distinguished Member of Congress here, and I think he is one of the most useful officers in the Army or Navy, a young man whose life I hope will be spared to the service for many, many years. I regret that he is now in bad health. I think he is one of the ideals of the Army or Navy. He is a man of fine spirit and fine character. In addition to being a man of fine spirit and character and a man to be admired in time of peace, he is a great soldier. He is as great a soldier as ever wore the uniform of America or any other country, a man of Spartan courage—truthful and honest and straightforward—that is Gen. Smedley Butler. [Applause.]

Now, you do not find Smedley Butler, every time he wants a little improvement on a house, letting the house rot down. He goes and says to the boys, "Let us fix the house." In other words, he does thousands and thousands of dollars' worth of work, and it does not cost the Government a penny. Why? Because he gets the right sort of spirit into his men. Thousands and thousands of dollars are saved in the way of labor. Why? Because they have the right spirit. Now, I feel that if you would put this right spirit into the Army officer, if you would fill him with that enthusiasm for service, fill him with that desire to render efficient service to the country in time of peace, get him to understand that there is a bottom to the Treasury, that there is a limit to the patience of the American taxpayer, if you please, so that he will have the men to become useful in time of peace and save money for the taxpayer by doing things for themselves, then you will begin to popularize your Army. You can not popularize the Army by the present conduct of the Army among the people and the taxpayers.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In connection with what the gentleman was discussing a moment ago about these typewriters, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] says that his committee was never able to find out about them; the gentleman from Mississippi says his committee has never been able to find out; and the gentleman from Illinois here is silent. Is it true that three great committees of this House acknowledge themselves as impotent?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman will find in the hearings a statement of the number of typewriters on hand.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not talking about typewriters alone, but about all this surplus property.

Mr. SISSON. Yes. Those were the typewriters that they have been able to find on hand. Now, where did the thousands of typewriters go that we do not find?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It seems to me, inasmuch as the war has been over four years, that somehow these committees ought to find out something about it and not simply be talking about it. If we have surplus property, why do not these committees provide for its ascertainment and disposition?

Mr. SISSON. I will say to my friend that the Committee on Appropriations is not a legislative committee. Not only that, but in order to find out more than the information the department is willing to give you, you would have to get on the train and visit all these depots and make a thorough investigation. I feel that even now, as late as it is, the proper committee could and should visit all the depots and make an inventory of all of this stuff.

I can only speak for the Committee on Appropriations or such subcommittees of it as I have served upon. I do not believe the gentleman himself or any other Member of Congress could have been more diligent in his inquiry in regard to this matter than the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] and the chairman of the present subcommittee [Mr. ANTHONY] and myself have been.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not mean to criticize the committee, but members of the committees come on the floor of Congress and growl about it without producing a remedy.

Mr. SISSON. I am not growling about it. As my duty was, I have made such inquiry as I could, and then I come back and tell you what I find. Then it is just as much the duty of my good friend from Texas and of any other Member of the House to institute an inquiry as it is my duty. This is a Republican House, and the power and burden is on them, not on me or the Democrats. They are in the majority.

Resolutions can be written and votes can be had, and no man can pass the buck to me. I have done the best I could, and so have the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. We have done all we could do, unless we turned ourselves into Burns detectives, and that is not a very delightful occupation for a Member of Congress; and then you Members now criticize the Appropriations Committee when we attempt to do the very thing you now demand, and accuse us of usurping the authority of all the other committees of the House.

Mr. MCKENZIE. The gentleman will remember that a year ago he made a very able and forceful address on the question of vocational training in the Army and the employment of a large number of civilian employees to carry it on. I wanted to know if the gentleman and his committee had taken any particular steps to cut down that expenditure, and also to cut down the expenditure for the hire of a large number of civilian employees out at Camp Holabird, where the repairs on that large stock of automobiles ought to be made.

Mr. SISSON. I want to say to my friend that I personally would cut down that expenditure, and have made an effort to do so, but I am not the whole committee. I am not at all in sympathy with many expenditures that I might mention. But I make the same plea that my friend makes, that I am not the whole committee. But there is this to be said in behalf of not taking any precipitate action. We can not afford to abandon the property. If those people are there taking care of the property, we can not decline making the necessary appropriations to pay them. We can not allow the property to be destroyed and stolen and lost. Much of this property is very valuable. The present program, according to the testimony, is to concentrate all the property that it is necessary to keep at a few points. The balance of this property that they do not need will be sold and the money covered into the Treasury. They expect to sell a great deal of it in a few weeks. A large part of it is listed and in process of being sold at the present time. When that is done a lot of this force will be dispensed with.

Mr. MCKENZIE. But the gentleman is not answering my question about vocational training in the Army and the large number of civilian employees engaged to carry it on.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, the gentleman asked me more than one question at once. I understand that a good lawyer is a man who fires a double-barreled question at a witness, and if the witness tries to answer both barrels at the same time he will get into trouble. As to vocational training, everybody in this country agrees that with respect to the soldier who is maimed or injured or disabled it is the duty of the country to recuperate him if possible. Vocational training is not a bad thing, but I think a great many of the boys have been imposed upon, and I believe that a great many of the boys who are taking vocational training are imposing on the Government. But I do not think we should stop the training and education of the maimed or the halt or the blind.

Mr. MANN. That has nothing to do with vocational training in the Army.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I do not mean rehabilitation of disabled soldiers. I am talking about these instruction camps, such as they have down at Camp Lee.

Mr. SISSON. You mean the vocational training of the soldier in the Regular Army while he is actively engaged?

Mr. MCKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I would give him vocational training along the lines I spoke of a moment ago. I would give him vocational training that would amount to something. I would teach him the carpenter's trade, or I would teach him to be a brick mason by letting him lay bricks on some buildings that we need. I would teach him to be a civil engineer by having him lay off ditches and build the fortifications that we need. I would make him useful and not merely theoretical and ornamental. I would give him study hours and require the Army officers to be his teachers. I would not employ civilians to teach him. We do not need to pile up that expense on the taxpayers, but we could make our Army officers useful. In other words, give them something to do.

Mr. MCKENZIE. The gentleman would not say he would take good lumber and turn it over to these soldiers to cut up?

Mr. SISSON. No. We have all the lumber we need, and we would not have to buy an additional foot if we should use the enlisted men instead of civilians in doing this work.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I take it from the statement of the gentleman that he would prefer to let a set of officers' quarters fall down unless he could use the enlisted men to make the repairs.

Mr. SISSON. No; I do not mean that. But I do say that my friend would before he would require an Army officer or a Regular private soldier to make the repairs. Does the gentleman have such a poor opinion of our private soldier that he thinks they are so worthless and stupid as not to be able to do anything for themselves? Let the gentleman go down to the Panama Canal Zone and see what has been done there, and let him go down and look at those houses that were built at Quantico. Then the gentleman would change his mind. You will find better bricklayers and brick masons in the Army and Navy and Marine Corps than you will find laying brick sometimes in private employment at the union scale of wages. We know that even with the union bricklayer you have to have a director supervise the building. You have to have somebody who understands building a house, but when you have got the direction it is just like the work of a private soldier under the direction of a colonel. He does what he is told to do. A bright soldier can become an efficient workman, and even if he does ruin a little plank occasionally, it is still much cheaper than to hire professional civilian help.

Gentlemen, I have talked long enough. I feel that I should not trespass on the time of others. But I want to conclude what I have to say by referring to the amount of money that would be saved by the reduction in the size of our Army.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. How many officers are detailed for this training corps in the schools?

Mr. SISSON. There are on duty at schools and colleges as instructors 643; at the general service schools, including the Military Academy, 243 instructors; and at general official service schools, such as the Infantry School at Camp Benning, Ga., 1,869 instructors and student officers.

Mr. Chairman, I fear that our Army expenses will continue to be very burdensome. Look at the money the people have had to expend since 1896. Just take the figures and add them up. They are as follows:

Expenditures for military purposes, by fiscal years, 1896–1921 (fiscal year ending June 30).

1898	65,362,261.44

Now, this is only the Army expense and does not include the Navy and many other military and naval expenses. But look, gentlemen, during the year 1914, the first year of the World War, we expended $113,318,555.36, as compared with $439,485,094.73 this last year. This year we should get back to normal. The people demand it. They are tired of this great burden, and they see no reason why they should now support all this tinsel and red tape and show.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that this World War has taught not only us but the people of the world some useful lessons. One thing we should learn is that so-called military preparedness does not insure a nation a victory. Germany was the best-prepared nation in the world and yet she failed. Let me repeat what I have so often said on this floor before. A nation is not strong in comparison to the size of its army or navy. A big army and a big navy in time of peace are more often evidence of the weakness of a nation. A nation is only strong when that nation's government is loved and honored by its people. When the people love the government their capacity to defend and protect it depends first upon its food supply. In other words, the strength of the government is dependent primarily upon the strength and prosperity of its farmers. No army is strong unless it is fed. Every modern military authority worth consulting confirms this statement. You can not determine a nation's strength by looking at the size of her army or the number of her ships. Our best preparation to-day is to relieve the taxpayers of their burden and give the people a chance to get out of debt and to be independent and prosperous. Let them know that those in power will not take from them their substance and give it to others, even though they do wear the uniform of a soldier. The people believe, and so do I, that a big army is provocative of war and that a big army is the cause of most wars. It was the cause of the World War. Germany thought that she could rely upon her war machine to end the war quickly. If she had not had the big army she would not have so precipitately rushed into this war. A few weeks' delay would have averted this war. Too much army has been the curse of the world. A large standing army is a constant enemy to all good government. Nations are too prone to go to war when they have a large army, and that for no good cause.

In a speech that I made here a good many years ago I made the statement that a careful study of the causes of war will convince people that most wars are fought over very frivolous affairs and that most of them have been fought about matters which could have been adjusted if men had approached the question with fair and open minds. I do not know of a better illustration of that than the spark that set the world afire in the murder of the Austrian crown prince and princess. That little spark set the world afire and caused the World War. That World War cost the Governments of Europe and the Government of the United States, as nearly as can be estimated—and it is still only an estimate—something like $300,000,000,000. With what we loaned the Allies it cost us something like $50,000,000,000. It cost England more than that many billions of dollars. But that is nothing compared to the financial loss occasioned by the disorganization of business and to the loss of life.

Now, while we are protesting to the world that we are a Nation of peace lovers, why not make good our profession at this hour in the history of the world? If the other nations of the world do not follow in our lead there is no trouble to change our tactics instantly. But now is the time of all times in the history of the world to take the lead and show the world that we believe the world can transact its business without resorting to bestial and horrid war. Gentlemen of the committee, stop for one moment and think of the horrors of this war just closed—more horrible than any war in the past. When we think of it we shudder and wonder, "Is all this a necessary part of our boasted civilization? Are we really civilized? Are we far removed from savagery? Is the civilized man more cruel than the savage?" If you scratch skin deep you seem to find a fiendish savage in us all. Gases and acids and the modern horrible weapons of death, invented and used were never dreamed of in the past. However much men may throw up their hands and protest against it, when war comes we are going to destroy the enemy with whatever means we have, and the more effective, however cruel, we are going to use, and there is no use in our deceiving ourselves. When human beings act in mass and are enraged they become beasts, and when acting in mass are the most cruel of beasts, because they exercise the highest degree of intelligence in the destruction of their enemies.

What we need to do now as a Nation is to make a substantial reduction in our Army and Navy so as to be able to say to the world, "Come and join in this march of peace." Stop for one moment and think what might have been accomplished for the people of the world if they had used these billions in upbuilding the nations of the earth, in enlightening the dark places of the world along peaceful pursuits and peaceful improvements. What miles of magnificent highways might have been constructed across our fertile plains and over our mountain ranges! What marvelous leviathans of the sea might have been constructed to enable us to communicate with every port of the world! What marvelous institutions of education might have been erected! How much could have been accomplished for the poor and ignorant of this world by the expenditure of that vast sum of money! Indeed, if it had been done with the same earnestness as we went to war and flew at each others' throats, no doubt we would have reached that time prophesied that we are to reach in some age of the world's history, when "they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." We would have reached that period when the man most honored would be the one who distributed the greatest pleasures in the world by acts of charity, the man who removed the pangs of pain from the greatest number of hearts, the man who dried up the greatest number of human tears. He would have been the man most honored, and not the man who had directed armies in the shedding of oceans of blood. The most honored men in history have been the great captains of death, the great leaders of men who, if they had done privately what they did as leaders of armies, would have been stigmatized as the greatest murderers of the earth. The man who slays his private enemy is called a murderer, and we draw our cloaks around us and shun him as if he were to be dreaded and feared. But when we vote to go to war and when with drums and banners our boys go marching down the street, we make heroes of the great military commanders.

We have made the Cæsars and Alexanders and Napoleons, the Lees and the Grants, the great heroes of history, and have pointed our boys to them as great men. They were great men, but I fear that we have overlooked those things which were greatest in them. The greatest thing about Lee was not the fact that he was a great director of men in telling them how to kill one another. The fact that Robert E. Lee was a great character, a great heart, and a great man—these are the things that we ought to remember. He was one of the greatest men of all the world for all times because of these mighty virtues. The same is true about Grant. While he was a great commander, yet the greatest things that Grant did were not those that are always remembered about him. The greatest things that Grant did were those he was able to accomplish immediately after the war. I think the greatest thing Grant ever said was when he was called upon to send some fresh troops to one of the States erstwhile at war with him. He sent that famous message that blazed its way from one end of this country to the other: "Let us have peace. We have had enough bloodshed." That great heart of his is the thing that ought to make the boys love and admire him. Ah, we have been making too much of generals. We have been making too much of the soldier and not enough of the accomplishments of good men in time of peace. Our poets sing of the man at the head of the battle, but they do not sing as often about the man who is the head of some great peaceful institution. I can not refrain from reading what to my mind is a perfect description of a modern army and a modern war. I want to call your attention specially to this, although written a few years ago, before the late war, it is a perfect pen picture of the late war:

TO SAFEGUARD PEACE PREPARE FOR WAR.

I know that maxim; it was forged in hell.
This wealth of ships and guns inflames the vulgar
And makes the very war it guards against.
The god of war is now a man of business,
With vested interests.
So much sunk capital, such countless callings,
The Army, Navy, medicine, the church—
To bless and bury—music, engineering,
Red-tape departments, commissariats,
Stores, transports, ammunition, coaling stations,
Fortifications, cannon foundries, shipyards,
Arsenals, ranges, drill halls, floating docks,
War-loan promoters, military tailors,
Camp followers, canteens, war correspondents,
Horse breeders, armorers, torpedo builders,
Pipe-clay and medal venders, big-drum makers,
Gold-lace embroiderers, opticians, buglers,
Tentmakers, banner weavers, powder mixers,
Crutches and cork-limb manufacturers,
Balloonists, mappists, heliographers,
Inventors, flying men, and diving demons,
Beelzebub and all his hosts, who, whether
In water, earth, or air, among them pocket—
When trade is brisk—a million pounds a week!

This is the principal motive behind war. Trade, profit, riches. Novicow, the great Russian authority on war, wrote a history of wars. He says that there have been more than 8,000 wars, great or small. He endeavors to show you what it cost, and he says the cost of all the wars prior to the Civil War was about $800,000,000,000. If that be true this last war cost about one-third or more of all the wars in all the past.

Now, he says the causes of most wars have been frivolous. All modern wars have all been either for acquisition of territory or for the acquisition of trade or for trade advantages.

The truth is that this last war fought by Germany was started with the first bad excuse Germany had in endeavoring to get across the Balkan States to Constantinople. Germany had a secret treaty with the Turkish Government to get from Constantinople down to Bagdad. The murder of the crown prince was an excuse to make war on the Balkan States. The German Government felt sure that if they could run across the little Balkan States and get to Constantinople they would say then that we will quit fighting right now and all we ask is that you let us build the railroad from Constantinople down to Bagdad. England did not want the road to be built and did not intend to allow Germany to get that base in the Indian Ocean at Bagdad. You may reason about it and let the military experts talk about it, but that was the real cause of the war—the effort on the part of Germany to get trade to the Indian Ocean by the most direct route, and England did not propose that she should have it. That again was a trade war. So it is in nearly all cases, the provoker of the war is the man who is seeking some selfish advantage. Therefore, I hope and trust that out of all the conferences we have held the statesmanship and patriotism of the world will be able to evolve some method of settling our differences without going to war. The people of all the world profess to believe in some religion and, whether following Mohammed or Aheuramasda or Buddha or Zoroaster or Christ, they are all following and believing in a Prince of Peace, because every one of these great founders of religions teaches that a time will come when all the world will be at permanent peace and all will deal with each other as brothers. There is a millennium in all these religions. All civilized people pretend to believe in one or the other of these great religions. They then are all hypocrites unless they believe that the time will come when wars will cease and the world will devise some means of settling its differences without going to bloody war, without resorting to murder, and if it is to be by a league of nations or by a conference, whatever it may be, I do not care, let us have the good sense to stop playing politics with human life and international affairs and try to join the right-thinking people throughout the world so that we may solve these great international differences without a repetition of this holocaust of blood and slaughter and this worse than hell on earth—another war. [Applause.]

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, a familiar and very beautiful story by Maurice Maeterlinck pictures Tyltyl and his sister, children of a humble woodcutter, as dreaming on Christmas eve that they were sent by a fairy to find the bluebird of happiness. In this quest they wandered far from their home, and by their magic power they explored the past and peered into the future and talked with babies unborn. They sought in vain for the bluebird, and then they returned broken-hearted to their cottage only to find the coveted prize of their quest at their own hearthstone. How it got there they did not know.

In August, 1868, a party of scientists, during an eclipse of the sun, were looking 92,000,000 miles away. By the use of a spectroscope they found in the solar chromosphere a peculiar yellow line, somewhat akin to the line made by sodium, and yet somewhat different. They wondered what it was. It had no counterpart in their scientific knowledge, and I fancy there must have been among them quite a bit of speculation as to what this rare element could be that could thus withstand the terrific heat of the sun. I imagine that they wished that on the earth they might find something like it, that they might learn of its nature and adapt it here to its use. To their surprise a few years later, in the air about them, in vapors emanating from certain hot springs, in certain ores, and finally in natural gas, they detected the presence in their world of this same solar phenomenon. They named this rare element at the time of its discovery helium, from the Greek word helios, the sun. They came back after this quest on high and found it in bountiful profusion at home. How it got here they do not know.

Sometimes we fail to appreciate the things that we have at our own doors, the things which flourish and prosper in our own climes.

I recall that a few years ago in our military regalia we had something approaching the German helmet. To-day we have the English military cap, and we have imported the Sam Brown belt. We went to Italy and bought the Roma and to England for the Z R–2. It used to be a fashionable thing to possess articles made in Germany. I am glad that the time has come, and I hope it is coming more and more, when we may free ourselves of this enchantment which distance lends and come back and find that things made in Germany and elsewhere are excelled in America. [Applause.] In the military realm we have here at home a practical monopoly of this wonderful element first discovered in the envelope surrounding the sun, and it is an asset valuable in peace as well as in war. I am glad we are coming to realize its importance, and I congratulate the committee upon its wisdom in making an appropriation somewhat commensurate with the requirements of the operations of our helium plant, for we have in this country the only one for the extraction of helium in quantities that may be found in the entire world.

The statement has been made that our expenditures for helium have been large and our production relatively small. It has occurred to me in this connection that there should be placed in the RECORD for the information of the Members of this House and for the country in general a statement of the nature and amounts of the expenditures which have been made in the development of this project. Up until 1917 there had been extracted in the whole world but a few cubic feet of helium, derived principally from uranium ores, procured in laboratories at the prohibitive cost of from $1,700 to $2,000 a cubic foot. Realizing its importance in war, after its discovery in this country in natural gas in sufficient quantity to make its extraction a practical and feasible thing, the Government built three experimental plants.

Plant No. 1 was located at Fort Worth, Tex. Its construction period ranged from November, 1917, to March, 1918, 4 months; its operating period from March, 1918, to March, 1919, 12 months. That plant cost $281,400, and the pipe line which supplied it with gas, $51,500, making a total expenditure for that plant of $332,900. That plant has now been dismantled and the liquefaction equipment salvaged to the amount of $87,100. It used the Linde process, subsequently adopted in the permanent plant. These first three plants I mention were experimental plants.

Plant No. 2, also at Fort Worth, had a period of construction from November, 1917, to May, 1918, 6 months, and of operation from May, 1918, to March, 1919, 10 months. It was erected at a cost of $368,500. The pipe line cost $51,500, and the total of expense of that plant was $420,000. This plant was dismantled after the experimental stage and was reerected at Langley Field, Va., as a helium repurification plant. These two plants succeeded in extracting from natural gas helium of 92 per cent purity.

A third experimental plant was at Petrolia, Tex., and was constructed during the period from April, 1918, to October, 1918, six months. Its operating period began in October, 1918, and continued until June, 1921, two years and nine months. It was erected at a cost of $1,068,250. However, this has been purely experimental, and the helium first derived there was of only 37 per cent purity.

Upon the demonstration of the feasibility of the helium project through these three experimental plants a great production plant was erected at Fort Worth, Tex. The period of its construction was from October, 1918, to March, 1921, two years and five months, and the period of its operation was from March, 1921, until it closed last November, the 30th, because of insufficient funds. The plant cost $2,024,194.74. The pipe line to Petrolia, a distance of 104 miles, cost $1,617,952.04. This pipe line was constructed and this plant built at Fort Worth by reason of the fact that it was the nearest city where there were sufficient water and power to operate a plant of this size and character. For conservation of helium we gave $1,500,000. In other words, that is the price of the contract with the company that owned the gas for the right of the Government to extract the helium from it. The total cost of that plant, including the pipe line and the contract for the conservation of helium, was $5,142,146.78.

There has been some expenditure also in the matter of research in order that this chemical element, a novel one in mundane affairs, might be more thoroughly understood. A laboratory was constructed for that purpose, and the total expense in that regard was $89,981.50. Then, there was some expenditure, naturally and necessarily, for exploration in order to determine where helium in this country might be found, and in that undertaking there has been expended $25,000. For experimentations in mine storage of helium in quantities after its extraction there has been expended $18,000. The sum total of all these expenditures is $7,096,278.28. That represents the total amount expended in the helium project up until the beginning of the present fiscal year. For the present fiscal year the Army appropriation bill carried $250,000, and, in view of the fact that the Army and the Navy have operated this project on a 50–50 basis, a similar amount was spent also from the Navy appropriation bill. In other words, for the extraction of helium after its feasibility had been determined through proper experimentation, after the plant and pipe line had been constructed, we have expended only $500,000, and for that $500,000 we have to-day more than 2,000,000 cubic feet of helium. We have stored in the plant at Fort Worth about 2,400,000 cubic feet of helium, but a small part of that was derived from these three original experimental plants—about 240,000 cubic feet—and that quantity of the gas was in metal cylinders on the docks at New Orleans ready for export abroad, to be used in the war, at the time of the signing of the armistice.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am wondering whether or not there is any considerable loss in the storage of helium. Is there any loss after you put it into the tanks?

Mr. LANHAM. There is none. And besides the helium of 92 per cent purity which was taken out of the experimental plants back in 1918 tests just as pure to-day as then.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Under what pressure is it stored in the tanks?

Mr. LANHAM. Each tank contains about 200 cubic feet of helium. They are cylindrical, small tanks about 6 feet high I suppose and about 8 or 10 inches in diameter.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does the gentleman know under what pressure?

Mr. LANHAM. I am unable to inform the gentleman under what pressure they are stored, except that it is under pressure sufficient to get about 200 cubic feet in each tank.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In using helium in lighter than air machines is there any wastage of the gas?

Mr. LANHAM. The wastage of helium through the fabric is very much less than that of hydrogen. The experiments recently conducted with the C-7, which has made several experimental flights, shows that the loss of the gas is very negligible, and in addition to the desirability of the use of helium because of its noninflammability, it has been shown also that the loss is very much less than that of hydrogen.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Then there is no considerable loss in the making of a flight, in going up or down?

Mr. LANHAM. No. Not so much as in the case of hydrogen, as it is not so often necessary to valve it.

Now, gentlemen, when it is said that helium is costing us considerable sums of money, we must remember that most of that money has been spent, first, in experimental plants to determine if this new project could be made a success and, secondly, in the building of a permanent plant for helium extraction. Only $500,000 has been actually devoted since the construction of that plant to the extraction of helium. To divide the quantity of helium we have produced into our total expenditures as an estimate of its cost, is very much on a par with saying that if we built a shoe factory and it cost a million dollars to construct it, and then we manufactured one pair of shoes and that pair of shoes cost $5, we could not afford to manufacture shoes in that factory since it cost $1,000,005 a pair to make them.

I apprehend that that mistake has been made in a great many estimates as to the cost of helium in its production in this country. The price has been reduced from 40 cents in the experimental plants to as low as 7 and 8 cents per cubic foot in this extraction plant, and that has been accomplished despite the facts that the project is an entirely new one, that difficulties were encountered which could not be foreseen, and that the correction of these mechanical troubles has been charged up to the cost of production.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. CHALMERS. I will say to the gentleman I heard Dr. Moore, who has been in charge of the experimental station here, say in an address last evening that if these experimentations are not curtailed and they have money enough to continue them, it was his professional judgment that the cost of this would be further reduced to 2½ to 3 cents per cubic foot in time.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman's information is accurate in that regard. That is the hope of the scientists.

Mr. MANN. I wonder if the gentleman can satisfy my curiosity?

Mr. LANHAM. I shall try to do so if I am able.

Mr. MANN. Of course, after the helium is extracted from this gas, the gas has to be used?

Mr. LANHAM. It is used commercially; yes, sir; and is better for it by reason of the fact that a noninflammable element has been taken from it.

Mr. MANN. Is there plenty of demand at Fort Worth for the gas from which helium can be extracted?

Mr. LANHAM. The contract, as I understand it, with the Lone Star Gas Co., from which we get the gas, calls for only 15 per cent of it.

Mr. MANN. That is, the Fort Worth people can only use 15 per cent?

Mr. LANHAM. No, sir; the Government can only extract helium from 15 per cent of it, and the contract calls for the remaining 85 per cent to be used commercially without extraction of helium.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 9606) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to take up a little time under general debate, because I intend later to offer an amendment to the bill to secure a larger appropriation for research work in aviation. There seems to have been some misunderstanding between the greatest aeronautical engineer whom we have in the United States—and I refer to the commanding officer at McCook Field, the research station of the Army—Air Service, on the one hand, and the committee, on the other, because there seems to be an idea, first, that the Government aviation research or experimental organization was in such condition that it could not expend the appropriation made last year. First, I want to say with respect to that, that the Government experimental station at McCook Field could profitably spend $10,000,000 a year, and that amount could easily have been expended last year on aviation research work. The truth of the matter is that the Director of the Budget asked the head of the Air Service to make a reduction in the amount of expenditures in the Air Service, and, in his discretion, the head of the Air Service directed this engineer—Maj. Thurman H. Bane—in charge of all the research work to cut $400,000 more or less off of that particular branch of aviation expenditures. The result was that the force was disorganized, men were discharged, and many important projects for the advancement of this Nation were curtailed.

In the second place, there seems to have been an idea gotten out that the research work of the Air Service does not need certain of the features which are believed by this engineer to be important. There have been immense appropriations made by foreign countries. I am referring not only to Japan, the program for which is the expenditure of $200,000,000 for aviation in the next seven years, but I am referring to our former allies or associates—Great Britain and France—which countries can not pay the interest on the money which they owe the United States. The appropriations for France are at normal rates of exchange over $84,000,000 for aircraft production and experimentation work. In Great Britain, at normal rates of exchange, which we are fast approaching, the appropriations now amount to over $97,000,000 a year. And these, contrasted with the appropriations in the United States, are so liberal that the people here in Congress charged with this responsibility ought to be aroused to some facts of our history.

Who invented the machine gun—the Gatling gun? An American. Who invented the steamboat? Fulton—an American. Who invented the submarine? An American. Who invented the airplane? An American. Now, what is the history of our inventions? What became of and of what use was the steamboat to us? It ruined our commerce. Preceding the days of the Civil War our clipper wooden ships, under sail, carried American products into all the ports of the world. Fifty per cent of the commerce in the Far East was in the hands of American shipping. At the close of the Civil War we had little or no merchant marine. It had disappeared, and for two causes; first, because the Confederate privateers, the Alabama and others, had succeeded in driving off our merchant ships or had seized or sunk them. In the second place, steam navigation had not been developed in this country. The ingenuity of the American people had been wasted and had been given away for the benefit of foreign nations. When we were busy with our internal discords and dissentions the foreigners came forward with the steamship and took away from the United States its place in the world's commerce and affairs, and we never have regained it. Wise persons of Europe seized upon the inventive skill of the United States and profited by those inventions to our great loss. The submarine was neglected by the American people. It originated in American ingenuity, and we to a large extent, with the Allies, were the sufferers because of its invention, which we had neglected.

Maxim could get little or no attention or help in the United States for his machine gun. We seemed to have not an inexhaustible Treasury, as suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], but we seemed to have an inexhaustible conceit in the absolute lack of limitation of our inventive ideas, and we may be absolutely right on that. But we invented this wonderful engine of destruction, the machine gun, and then calmly abandoned it, so that it has cost us in lives and property a tremendous sum. So when we got into this war we had to call upon Great Britain to furnish us with machine guns; we had to call upon France to give us the Benét-Mercier gun; we had to equip some of our troops with their Chauchat rifles. And so it went on, and at the close of the war we had the Browning gun, and to-day we are still using in our airplanes the Lewis gun.

We turn to aviation, and what do we find? We find that in the United States, though proud of the achievements of the Wright Brothers, lack of appreciation by the home people led them to go across to France, where their invention was better appreciated, where the Government took it up, and where the value of the invention was recognized, and so at the beginning of the war we woke up and found that America was so far behind that it was shameful and pitiful. This Congress then, in its energy, appropriated in successive appropriations more than a billion dollars, and we were in the war from the 6th of April, 1917, to the 11th of November, 1918, and with all our great ingenuity and with all our money we could not put one fighting plane on the front in Europe, not one.

Now, I want to speak of some lessons which we have learned from that war in reference to the ceiling as they call it, of our airplanes, because I want to emphasize the value of the research work that is going on at McCook Field.

During the war the first equipment that our American aviators had was the old French Nieuport machine. It could not stand up. The fabric was stripped from the wings on these planes when they attempted to make landings in an emergency. Then we had the Spad plane, and our greatest American aviator, Rickenbacher, equipped himself with a Spad in Paris.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. May I have a few more minutes?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And by that he managed to maintain a ceiling of 20,000 feet, almost equal to the achievements of the best German planes. Twenty thousand feet above the earth was the limit. Now, how have we been able to do what we can do? We have put a man 40,000 feet off the earth at McCook Field, up to where it is 50° below zero, and where the atmosphere, instead of being 14 pounds to the square inch, is only 3; where the human body becomes soft and flabby from lack of normal air pressure, and where he would freeze instantly if it were not for his electrically heated clothing. I refer to the accomplishment of my friend, Lieut. John A. McCready, holder of the world's altitude record. How can we do it? By the research work which has been going on at McCook Field, by reason of what is known as the supercharger, to collect and compress the air with the gases of the engine, so that the full force of the horsepower of the engine may be maintained in the light atmosphere where the air is so thin. We put this man up there. Now, for practical purposes what does it mean? The man who is aloft in the air, who is above the other fellow, has a great advantage. During the war, when we could not get a machine that could climb to the altitudes of the foreign machines, we could not clear the sky, and the German planes came over and took pictures of the entrenchments and fortifications, of the thousands of troops being moved to the front, and we were absolutely helpless because we could not get up there.

Now, we can send up a photographic plane and we have developed a photographic apparatus that can take the pictures at 30,000 feet, so far away that the airplane can not be observed by one below, and accurate pictures may be taken of the surface of the ground under those conditions, and we can put a fighting plane so high in the air that there is not a rival in Europe that can contest the power, if we are allowed to go on and progress.

I want to read at this time, in confirmation of what I have said, a letter from the commanding officer at McCook Field, referring to these ideas which the committee may have had with reference to the demand or the need of this research work. I read:

MARCH 13, 1922.

Hon. ROY G. FITZGERALD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: Referring to your inquiry of the 12th instant, in which you state that members of the Appropriations Committee gathered the impression from the hearings that we were unable to expend this year the full $4,300,000 appropriated for aviation experimentation and research, I have the honor to inform you that the committee is in error. The facts are as follows:

The Director of the Budget directed the Chief of Air Service to affect a saving of $1,000,000 out of this year's appropriations. The Chief of Air Service, acting within his discretion as to where this saving would be made, directed that $400,000 be saved out of the total of $4,300,000 appropriated for experimental purposes. I protested this action, as worthy projects had to be abandoned to make the saving. In addition, 250 employees were discharged in order to run McCook Field on the decreased allotment. We could have intelligently expended the full appropriation, so you see there was absolutely no question of inability to expend the money.

The facts are the science of aviation is so new and there are so many hundreds of things that should be done that we could have expended $10,000,000. I really believe that a proper figure for research and experimentation in aeronautics would be $10,000,000 annually. There is no better economy than scientific research.

If Congress could be impressed with the newness of this science and how little is definitely known about it, I am sure they would see the logic of pitching in and seeing that America leads the world in aviation advancement. Certainly in no other way can such a large measure of national defense be obtained for so little money.

I trust the present wave of economy—justifiable and desirable in the extreme—will not sweep away in its money-saving operations the Army Air Service research and experimental operations. I fear such action would be false economy.

Thanking you for your courteous interest in our activities, I am,
Very truly, yours,

THURMAN H. BANE,
Major, Air Service, Chief Engineering Division.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, one of the most interesting questions that has come before Congress and the country within recent years has been the question of the conservation and use of helium. Helium is a distinctive element in the form of a gas that appears in other gases and is extracted therefrom. The method of extraction is to subject the natural gas to intense pressure and reduce the temperature to such a degree as to cause the other gases to liquefy. Inasmuch as helium remains in a gaseous stage at a lower temperature than any other gas, the other gases can be liquefied and the helium conserved as a gas, which is usually placed in steel cylinders for preservation until such time as it is desired to use the same. In other words, the other gases are broken down and removed in liquid form, and after removal the pressure is released and the other gases returned to their gaseous form. The remarkable thing about the matter is that the value of the use of the other gases for heating and lighting purposes is not injured in any way, but, in fact, is improved by virtue of removing the helium. The helium that is thus removed is noncombustible, noninflammable, odorless, and tasteless.

The helium that is extracted is very valuable for use in the lighter-than-air craft. It has 92 per cent of the lifting power of hydrogen and at the same time does not involve the principal danger that arises from the use of hydrogen, to wit, the tendency to combustion. When a dirigible has been filled with helium there is absolutely no danger from an incendiary bullet or from the engine, because helium does not burn.

Another matter that is of great importance is the fact that this country has practically a monopoly on this kind of gas. There are very small quantities in Canada and in Italy, but the amount is so little as to be negligible, so that for all practicable purposes the United States Government has exclusive control of this kind of gas.

Another matter that is of great importance is the fact that helium can be conserved and used indefinitely. It may be held in steel cylinders and thus stored until it is needed for use, and after it has been used in one machine it can be transferred to another, and thus will last indefinitely. It can be arranged so that the loss even in using is very, very small. When these facts are placed alongside the further fact that with the use of the natural gas of this country, which contains helium, the supply is being forever exhausted and wasted, it is important that steps be taken to conserve the entire supply and thus to avoid the final loss of this valuable element.

The lighter-than-air craft played an important part in the great World War in the form of dirigibles and also of captive (?) balloons, and will tend to play a more important part in any war of the future. The only reason that the dirigibles were not used more extensively during the war is the fact that one strike from an incendiary bullet would bring the machine down in flames. The exhaust from the engine caused danger in this regard. However, even with these great handicaps which arose from the use of hydrogen in the lighter-than-air craft, much was accomplished, especially by the Germans by the use of this form of craft. Several different times they were able to throw bombs on London and other cities, and cause great danger and terror, and also cause the explosion of munition and destroy supplies which were gathered for use during the war. Great damage was done on days when clouds hung low, during which period the Zeppelin, hid in a cloud, would swing down a basket, which would be connected by a telephone with the main ship, and thus from a point far below the ship would be telephoned up the spot on which bombs should be dropped to be most effective. Notwithstanding the tendency to discount the part performed by the dirigible in the war it is an established fact that the Germans were planning just before the war closed to send a giant Zeppelin for the purpose of bombing New York City. This ship, to wit, the L–72, was constructed especially for that purpose. Col. Hensley, who talked with the pilot who was to have made the trip with the ship had the armistice not been signed, furnished some very interesting information. The Germans had got the weather charts of the German admiralty, German merchant marine, and the Danish merchant marine. These gave for each day the exact figures in miles of the North Atlantic and the weather conditions. So, theoretically, they made this trip more than 300 times, taking into consideration every possible contingency. The ship carried several tons of bombs and was fully capable of making the trip. New York would have been helpless except for the police revolvers, which could not have done much against an attack of this kind.

This was not a fanciful dream, but an actual plan that had fully matured. The man had been chosen to make the trip. Of course, failure meant death to every member of the crew, but men were easily found who were willing to offer themselves as a sacrifice on the altar of their fatherland. They were planning in every possible way for the hazardous journey, and every precaution known at the time was used in safeguarding this trip. Even with the tremendous handicap of the use of hydrogen less than one-third of the dirigibles which Germany sent out during the war were brought down, leaving a remainder which wrought terror in the hearts of the people who happened to be subject to their terrible raids.

If it were possible to have been serious in the intention of carrying out a trip across the Atlantic with a ship filled with hydrogen, how much easier and less hazardous would it have been had the same machine been filled with helium?

Up to a short time ago a great many were skeptical and made the assertion that helium could never be used commercially because of the cost of its extraction. But the tests have proven that it can be conserved at a relatively low cost, and it is expected that even the present cost will be very much lowered. An idea of the importance of this element is gained from the fact that some months ago a group of American business men formed the American Investigation Corporation for the purpose of investigating the practicability of establishing commercial air service with large rigid airships in this and other countries, and so satisfactory have been their investigations that the formation of a gigantic corporation for commercial air navigation has been announced, with such business men as Benedict Crowell; Owen D. Young, vice president of the General Electric Co.; Marshall Field the third; R. B. Mellon, of the Mellon National Bank, of Pittsburgh, and brother of the present Secretary of the Treasury; and a number of other successful business men of this country. Their plans involve the securing of a large number of dirigibles, for the present to be fabricated in Germany and transported and set up in this country. The largest ones are designed to provide accommodation for 100 passengers, as well as for mail and express. It is announced to be the plan to build ships for lines to South America and Europe when the facilities for complete construction have been arranged. It is not planned to use hydrogen gas but helium in these gigantic dirigibles, which it is asserted will replace the lighter machines of the various types.

No two countries have the same great natural resources. Our country, any country, should conserve and develop its own. The theory of yesterday, proved by practice to-day, is the basis of development for to-morrow. I know not what discoveries or inventions will be made in the infinite sea of the future, but I do know that any nation's natural resources are among its greatest assets and are its sources of supply. If America is to hold her rightful place in the vanguard of nations she should not, she must not, sit supinely by and see this great element wasted.

I can conceive of our national greatness surpassing all the glories of the past—a nation grown from simplicity and honor, the proud heritage of freedom and power, to a nation which loves the arts of peace rather than the implements of war, and which resorts to war only to keep her people free, whose love of peace and justice are known around the world and whose white-winged ships of the air shall carry a message of hope to all parts of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas yields back 11 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

Mr. SISSON. I also yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER] is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, since time immemorial mankind seems to have divided itself up into two opposing camps, one dominated by hard-headed friends of truth and facts, and another numerous and ofttimes powerful group of followers of the seductive will o' the wisp—the multicolored rainbow of impossible achievement. The ancients had their Utopia, and the Middle Ages rung with song and story of the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, and the great Spanish discoverer, Ponce de Leon, died in the fifteenth century firmly believing that he had located on our own shores of Florida the fountain of youth for which mankind had so long sought in vain.

In our own day and generation we coined that magnificent sounding word "Eureka," which again hailed to a waiting world that the Nirvana of perfection had at last been found, but this, like the rest, has been relegated to fancy and bereft of realization by that age-old "son of time"—the "logic of facts." So it is that mankind in all ages and in all climes has sought when confronted for a solution of the great problems of life, and more particularly with financial ones, some temporary formula or expedient which afforded seeming relief, but which would not bear the acid test of practical application in a strangely practical world.

The councils of State of the Middle Ages turned to the art of the alchemists for gold only to be disillusioned in failure. The French revolutionists, like their modern contemporaries, the Russian Bolsheviki, turned to the printing of worthless "assignats" only to be rewarded with that repudiation which follows all impossible schemes of finance.

The American Congress and the American people turn in the year 1922 to the House Ways and Means Committee for a workable soldiers' adjusted compensation bill only to be confronted with that child of "who knows who" characterized by some of the least charitable among us as having been conceived in haste, born in fright, and christened "impossible" by those who have viewed the infant at close range. [Laughter and applause.]

My colleague from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] who, true to the traditions of his native heath, demands to be shown, is the first ex-service man who has had the temerity to express himself on this bill. I have not discussed the matter with him personally, but he must have received something of the same reaction which I received when I first read the bill as reported, for I understand that he is quoted as saying that it is "an unfortunate child," and "that its father was haste, its mother was fear—some think he intended to say FREAR—and its name is bunk." [Laughter.] No one could ever accuse me of political connivance with a Democrat, as much as I respect some of the lovable Members who sit on the other side of the House, and it is only once in a lifetime that a Republican such as I and a Democrat such as my friend HAWES agree, and I submit the fact as proof that so far as I am concerned the criticism which I voice is not partisan.

Of course, I would not impute any political motives to my comrade and colleague of opposite political faith with whom on this occasion I find myself in such hearty agreement, but I can not pass on to a further discussion of the subject without parenthetically remarking that many of those of his party sitting in the high places and viewing the matter from the pinnacles of leadership occupied by two certain gentlemen whose names begin with capital "G" and who hail from two fine States beginning with capital "T" [GARRETT and GARNER of Tennessee and Texas], sometimes familiarly and affectionately referred to by the distinguished and popular chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. FORDNEY] as "our brethren, the Gold Dust Twins," presumably because they expect to "clean" us Republicans this fall. [Laughter.] We would not be bestowing upon these gentlemen the credit to which they are entitled were we not to admit that they are viewing this whole proposition with an astute political eye set upon the coming campaign.

Of course, if these gentlemen and their party had only conscripted labor and capital as they did soldiers at the beginning of our participation in the World War there would have been no adjusted compensation to adjust; but, as usual, they left undone the things which they should have done and did the things which they should not have done, so the Republican Party has this additional postwar problem to solve. We frankly admit that Democratic shortsightedness and inexperience has caused us many a sleepless night and no end of embarrassment. We have the record of our past achievements to stimulate us to further effort and we shall steer straight ahead until our goal is reached; that there will be difficulties and breakers ahead, who will deny? We are amidst them now, as we admit, on this bonus measure; but these will not deter us from conquering all obstacles in such a manner as to fulfill our highest obligations to the ex-service men and not put to too great a strain the finances of the country, upon whose recovery from the aftermath of the Great War the prosperity and contentment of over 100,000,000 Americans are dependent. [Applause.]

Perhaps after all we should not criticize the Ways and Means Committee too severely, for they have had a hard road to travel. Between political pressure for a willy-nilly bonus bill on the one hand and the organized propaganda for no bonus at all on the other hand, mixed with a medley of conflicting opinions and plans of those who have given this gigantic financial problem little study and less analysis, they have been placed in the proverbial predicament of being "between the devil and the deep sea." [Laughter.] In compliance with our persistent demands they have done something, and we can not accuse them of inactivity. They have at least brought out "a bill"; if we do not like it it is up to us to say so and offer constructive criticism of those features of it which are not in accord. We should have the courage of our convictions and not criticize or ridicule the work of the committee unless we are willing to take the political consequences—if political consequences there be—of frankly and concretely stating our views, so that those who have devoted themselves so assiduously to the difficult task of framing such a measure may know where we stand.

I know, and we all know, that these gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee have had great difficulties to surmount. It is a matter of general knowledge that from within their own ranks carefully planned and effective smoke screens have been launched which have precluded a fair consideration and analysis of the sales-tax suggestion submitted by the President of the United States. Insistent rumors of caucuses that have been held where noses have been counted and means devised for bluffing or creating pressure on the committee that would cause them to discard the Executive proposals without submitting them to the House as a body leave little doubt as to the tactics which have been used on this well-meaning committee, composed, as everyone knows, of some of the most able and distinguished Members of Congress. Is it not time that the case of Frear et al. against Harding et al., which up until now has been tried in secret and well-nigh disposed of in chaos should be brought into the open and put squarely before the people of the country? The "et al." parties attached to the President in this "cause celebre" are much more numerous than is generally admitted, and consist, I am convinced, of over half the ex-service men of the House, the majority of the Republicans, and a goodly sprinkling of Democrats. At least, why should not this question, divested of all camouflage and technicalities, be submitted to a free and unhampered discussion and vote by our membership? All sorts of uncomplimentary inferences have been whispered against those who seemed even inclined to agree with the President in his desire to give the sales-tax measure its day in court. It is naïvely insinuated that conscientious, God-fearing Members, who have great difficulty in paying their income tax, are the henchmen and coconspirators of great wealth, simply because they dare to stand with a Republican President and demand a fair and impartial hearing on a proposal which he in good faith has submitted. [Applause.]

From whence comes this legislative Ku-Klux, who by the process of gentle pressure seek to intimidate Members and hope to coerce great committees, who would give the soldier a bonus by fathering an impracticable and questionable scheme of finance? A coincident not to be ignored is that the imperial wizard of this klan, for whom personally I have nothing but the highest esteem, and who would perform all these miracles for us, hails from the same State from which the effulgent and famous La Follette's Weekly sheds its rays over a benighted continent. It is to be noted that both are opponents of the sales-tax measure proposed by the President; the weekly, at least, is consistent, as many will recall how it helped to win the war fought by the soldiers we now seek to compensate by opposing it. Yes, Mr. FREAR, we think we know how Wisconsin stands and why she stands where she stands. [Applause.]

Quite properly every Member of the House who is in favor of an adjusted compensation bill has viewed the efforts of the Ways and Means Committee to produce a satisfactory bill with the kindliest and most sympathetic interest. We have realized all along that to meet the legitimate desires of the veterans and at the same time to proceed with due regard to the financial condition of the country—in a topsy-turvy economic world—presented a problem of gigantic proportions, and when I was informed that the committee instead of adopting a selective cash feature such as had been suggested by various Members had inserted the so-called certificate plan in lieu of cash payment by the Government at this time I was inclined to favor it, for I believed it to lead in the direction of a saner and safer economic solution of this thorny problem.

When I learned that the certificate plan would permit of borrowing from the bank I accepted it provisionally, assuming, of course, that the security would be handled in such a way that it would be fluid in all legitimate banking transactions. Thus most of the Members accepted this compromise, as all compromises have to be accepted, feeling that if it could be shown to be practicable it was probably the best thing which could be obtained with due regard to the soldier and the Government. Until I read the bill I was prepared to go before the ex-service men of my district and the country with the statement that it was the best we could evolve out of a muddled and difficult situation. Personally I am frank to say that I was never fully satisfied to create even a deferred cash obligation of such magnitude without providing some specific means of raising the money. It seemed to me to violate the first tenets of good business procedure. Still I was prepared to support the bill if it could stand the acid test of scrutiny and the limelight of business analysis.

But when the bill was introduced and printed, along with my other colleagues, I received the first shock of disillusionment so far as the certificate feature of the bill was concerned; lo and behold, the child had been tampered with, and the smiling countenance with which it was to win its way among those who were to nurture it for the first few years of its young life was a "frozen" one. Some call it "frozen credit," which probably accounts for the "cold shoulder" it has received from bankers and economists alike who have been called in on the case and who are likely to act as foster mothers during the first three years of its young life, while its real mother, the United States Treasury, tries to recover her strength by "a voyage in Icarie" abroad in order to gain substance from foreign loans uncollected and perhaps uncollectible and which grow either in thin air or in the barren soil of an economically and physically shell-ridden continent. [Applause.] We now find ourselves in such a quagmire of quandary and embarrassment that Mr. Mellon, the constitutional opponent of all adjusted compensation or so-called bonus, challenges us to pull ourselves out by our own bootstraps, a feat of the impossible, and no doubt inwardly laughs and makes merry at our predicament.

Now, what shall we do in the matter?

Shall we let the unalterable opponents of all adjusted compensation sit in to see us encompass our own defeat, coupled with the ultimate downfall of the legislation to which we and our administration are committed? All this simply that we may for the moment satiate our pride of opinion and say to the world that we intend, willy-nilly, whether or no, to force this measure through the House as it is, knowing that it will rest for many weary months in that "august port of missing bills," the Senate, and that when it again finally sees the light of day in conference between the two Houses it must of necessity suffer a complete disfiguration and be submitted to one of two alternatives—either that of being so completely changed by the upper body that we will not recognize it, or a voyage to the White House unchanged, but where the veto surely awaits it, for whatever doubts the Members of this House may have as to the merits of the particular policies advocated by the distinguished American at the other end of the Avenue, no one can accuse him of vacillation or of lacking in party responsibility or leadership, for he has made it clear to all except those "who will not see" that he disapproves of any adjusted compensation measure to be passed at this time which does not embody the means of raising the revenue required to carry out the provisions of the bill. We all know that the President says what he means and means what he says, a frank and commendable American trait.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I will be glad to yield if I have time when I have finished my remarks. Who can say that in a matter involving such a large amount of the people's money at such an uneasy moment in the world's history and to be paid to a body of men who occupy such a place of high esteem in the hearts of the American people, that his position is not fundamentally sound and unassailable?

He is the chosen constitutional President of a Nation of a hundred and five million people and realizes that it is upon his shoulders that the larger share of the responsibility for weal or woe of the people and the success or failure of his administration must rest, and great man and President that he is, he does not shirk this responsibility. [Applause.] After all, fellow Members of the Republican side of the House, whether we will it or not, we will share it with him sooner or later, and the time is not far distant when the Republican President and this Republican Congress must stand or fall together. While there are among us some who feel themselves quite self-sufficient at times, who can truthfully say that he can go among his constituents this fall and lay claim to reelection as an independent candidate? We can not be Republicans at election time and independent on the floor of this House. Even our opponents, a strong but coherent minority which sits on the Democratic side of the House, recognizes and practices the doctrine of political consistency. It is high time that the cry of party solidarity be raised on the Republican side of this House. What greater opportunity to rise to the emergency than at the present moment when a bill in which the defenders of the Nation's institutions are vitally interested is before us? If there is a way out we must find it. Few Members of this House desire to have adjusted compensation deferred, and those of us who are committed to it in principle desire to have an opportunity to vote for a measure that will have a chance to become a law. The practical necessity of the situation demands that a bill be presented whose legislative pathway will not be strewn with thorns, but which will be reasonably clear through the Senate and up to the White House. Many of us are not personally committed to the cash feature, but if it can be included and the money raised by a practical means of taxation it would satisfy those who feel the need of it. Is there such a proposition, and should we adopt it? The President has frankly indicated that a manufacturers sales tax will meet with no opposition at the Executive end of the Avenue. He has just as frankly stated that rather than to accept any other means of raising the money at this time he would be flatly in favor of postponement. It is a frank statement of his position, we have the answer as to what can and can not be accomplished under existing circumstances. [Applause.] Without doubt a bill conforming to the President's suggestion would have a safe majority in the Senate and should be functioning within 90 days of passage in the House. Any other measure at this time is doomed to failure, and will defeat the purpose of those who are attempting to force it through, for following the weary months of waiting on the part of the expectant ex-service men will come the final disappointment and a spirit of dejection and cynicism which will far exceed the temporary elation caused by the passage of the bill as now reported in this body. The men will know they have been "gold bricked," and all who know the ex-soldier well, will tell you that he is unequaled for his powers of intuition and he will place the responsibility flatly upon those who have deceived him. [Applause.]

If I may be permitted to prophesy, the major criticism will fall on this House for having passed a legislative bill with full warning and full knowledge in advance that it was doomed to failure. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the present bill should finally be forced through both Houses and that it could muster a two-thirds vote in both Houses, which every Member knows it could not do in the Senate in the face of the President's opposition, and that it finally became a law over the President's veto. Would it, in view of its questionable financial features and the long delay which would be the price of such legislative tactics, be worth the price? Gentlemen, it is not even good politics, for it is not good American horse sense. That, at least, is expected of us by the American people, and if we fail in this we commit a political blunder for which those responsible will be held to account. [Applause.]

I am a friend of, but not of, the so-called farm bloc, which has voiced such violent opposition to all forms of a sales tax. The very word seems an anathema to them. I am against all blocs. I observed the iniquity of this system when recently I visited the German Reichstag, where they have 11 political parties or blocs in a body slightly larger than our own. It is the curse of any parliamentary system, and will prove a curse to ours if we adopt it, and we should have none of it. I vote with many of these gentlemen often, always when I think they are right, but I shall oppose them when I think they are wrong and feel that their attitude on a given question is in opposition to the best interests of the Republican Party, of which the majority of this so-called bloc are members. Frankly, I will say to them that I do not believe they carry the tonnage in this sales-tax matter they would have us believe; they are too nervous of their position; they have had us bluffed, myself included; but we are faced by necessity and must find a practical way out on this bonus measure. This, perhaps, has caused some of us to discover and we would like to share the opportunity with them to go on record with a clean-cut proposition based on a manufacturers' sales tax similar to the one in vogue in Canada, for the specific purpose of raising the cash required for the adjusted-compensation legislation shortly to come before the House.

I therefore submit this proposition to the Ways and Means Committee and challenge the opponents of the manufacturers' sales tax to submit the matter to a vote of the House before discarding it or refusing to consider it as a way out of the dilemma into which we have drifted. If you are convinced of your position you should not object to making the record clear for yourselves and permitting those of opposite views to have the same privilege. We are willing to measure our strength with you, that the country may know the result as shown by roll call, and that the responsibility may rest in any event where our constituents may see fit to place it. I was not one of the original proponents of the sales tax, but have until recently proceeded with an open mind, so I can not be accused of having any ulterior motives in the stand which I have taken.

I believe that we are called to meet a practical problem in a practical, workable way. Our President is a true friend of the ex-service men of the country and is committed to the principle of adjusted compensation, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding. With the utmost frankness he has pointed the way, and the Republican membership of this House has a right to expect of its leadership that it be given an opportunity to register by vote whether or not it desires to approve of the plan suggested by the Executive before being called upon to vote on an alternative measure of what many consider to be of questionable legislative merit.

We desire this opportunity, and feel that no substitute measure should be presented until we are first given an opportunity to vote for a measure which we are willing to accept, either on a basis of merit or of compromise, and which we know has a reasonable chance of ultimate passage and of obtaining the signature of the President.

Mr. Chairman, in the name of scores of my colleagues like myself who are in favor of adjusted compensation which has some chance of becoming a law and in the name of thousands of ex-service men who will not accept the excuse of legislative juggling and buncombe which is being prepared for them, I earnestly plead that a bill be brought out carrying a manufacturers' sales tax for raising the money required to satisfy the cash feature of the bonus or that a rule be provided whereby the proponents of this measure will be permitted to offer it as a substitute to the bill as presented and to have a separate record vote on the measure.

All of this I ask, Mr. Chairman, so that loyal Republicans and others who may see fit to join us may be given the opportunity of supporting the measure and of voicing our confidence in a Republican President elected and confirmed by a majority of over seven and one-half millions of our fellow citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the House, with the Senate, several months ago appointed a special committee to investigate agriculture.

Knowing the condition of the agricultural interests at that time, as well as now, I had been hoping that we would get action as well as an investigation from that committee.

Several weeks ago the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], who is chairman of the special committee, made a speech before the so-called Farmers' Conference at the Willard Hotel and stated that his committee had found the farmers unorganized and in need of long-term credits. I have a bill, or at least am the cause of a bill being introduced in the House, to amend the Federal reserve act so as to give to the farmers 12 months' credit, whereas they now only have 6 months. This bill, that would cover to a certain extent the findings of this special committee, sleeps soundly with the Committee on Banking and Currency.

I am going to charge here and now that excessively high freight rates are doing more to paralyze agriculture and stifle business than any other thing I know of. In making this charge I believe that the Members of Congress, as well as the special committee on agriculture, will agree with me.

However, if there are those who disagree with me as to this charge, I will be glad to yield so that they may stand and have their names recorded.

When the Congress passed the Esch-Cummins transportation act the Members not only seemed to have known the needs of the railroad owners, but immediately passed this bill giving them the power, through and under the Interstate Commerce Commission, to so increase freight rates on the shippers of this country until they would be assured that their income would yield them 6 per cent on their entire investment.

Not being satisfied with the ridiculous rates that are paralyzing the farmer, the railroads, through their agents, are allowed to issue tariffs that are approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission that mean highway robbery of the people.

I have in mind a tariff issued by one J. J. Cottrell, agent of the Southern Railway at Richmond, Va., which took effect October 15, 1921, known as tariff No. 2, Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 358, eastbound Carolina class and commodity tariff.

This tariff forbids the shippers of hogs from local and junction points in North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Virginia from shipping their hogs in double-decked cars to eastern cities and certain interior eastern points.

I called up the Southern Railway office here in Washington and obtained carload rates on standard cars of hogs shipped in single and double-decked cars from Springfield, S. C., to Richmond, Va., the complaint having come to me from Springfield, S. C., as to the injustice of this ruling on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I found that on account of shippers not being allowed the use of double-decked cars that it would take two single cars to carry the same number of hogs, costing the shipper $157, as against $92 for a double-decked car, making a loss to the shipper of $55.

I call this an outrage on the farmers and shippers of hogs from these States, especially at the time when the people of the cotton States are facing bankruptcy on account of the ravages of the boll weevil. My people are trying to get away from cotton by planting grain and raising hogs, so as to be able to live and pay their taxes, and now they are being penalized in the sum of $55 per car on shipments, or 25 per cent on the already high rates, and I am here to tell you gentlemen it is not right. However, I will say for the information of the Members of the House that I have taken the matter up with the Interstate Commerce Commission and I hope to obtain some relief.

Some time ago the Government sold quite a lot of nitrate of soda around $35 per ton, in lots too large for the individual farmer to buy, and since that time the importers of this country, few in number, have bought up and are now holding from the market nitrate of soda and are demanding $64 to $68 per ton, car lots delivered to the fertilizer merchants, with an additional $2 to $5 to be added as profit to the merchant, thereby costing the farmer from $65 to $75 per ton. I will say for the benefit of a great many of you who are not farmers and who know nothing about farming, that it is impossible to make a successful crop of any kind in the South without the use of nitrate of soda and if this Congress is a friend of the farmer it will investigate the outrageous acts of the nitrate of soda combination.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Are those Chilean nitrates which are sold at that price?

Mr. FULMER. It is the regular nitrate of soda used by the farmers of this country.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Chilean nitrate?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How do the prices of nitrates compare with the prices before the war, or the normal prices?

Mr. FULMER. I think the price is about $20 a ton higher. Anyhow, for the nitrate of soda formerly sold by the Government we find the price now just about double.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To what do you attribute that rise in price?

Mr. FULMER. I attribute it simply to the high-handedness of a combination that is able to rob the farmers. I want to say that the farmers of the South are financially unable to buy fertilizer and soda to any large extent. Therefore it is not the demand that is creating the high prices but it is simply a matter of a combination formed to squeeze the farmer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should think the price is pretty high.

Mr. FULMER. As I have just stated to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], due to the financial situation in the South at this time, the farmers are unable to buy fertilizer and nitrate of soda in large quantities, as heretofore; therefore it is not the demand that is causing this outrageous act on the part of the importer but it is a matter of highway robbery on the part of one of the largest trusts in America, framed to rob the man who feeds and clothes the world. Not only this, but this same Fertilizer Trust is spending thousands and thousands of dollars sending out propaganda and lobbying around Washington trying to defeat the plans of Henry Ford in securing Muscle Shoals, knowing their day of highway robbery will cease if Henry succeeds in getting the management of these plants.

I am watching and the American farmers and labor organizations are watching the Congress—that says so much and does so little for the farmer—as to the outcome of this Muscle Shoals proposition. I wonder if you will do the right thing, let Henry Ford have the Muscle Shoals plants, or will you heed your master's call and continue to let the American farmer be handled by this Fertilizer Trust?

I have a letter dated March 9, addressed to me from one of the largest fertilizer concerns in the country, stating, "We are unable to secure any nitrate of soda at any price at present." Also, on March 9, from another large fertilizer corporation, "It seems that importers have gotten control of soda and have put the price up to such an extent that we wish our people would just quit buying. The best price we could possibly make now is $65 f. o. b. Savannah, Ga."

The following from a large dealer:

BATESBURG, S. C., March 11, 1922.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It may be interesting to you to know that recently, within the last four months, nitrate of soda has advanced in price until to-day the large importers are asking and getting $61 per ton for the material f. o. b. cars ports. Only a few months ago it was quoted around $37 per ton f. o. b. cars ports. Only a month ago it was quoted around $48 per ton f. o. b. cars ports.

It appears that as the South is forced to reduce her requirements for this material the price is put up in proportion, so that the importers of this material—and there are very few of them, indeed, about four or five—will obtain the same amount of profit. So far as demand is concerned, the requirements will be less this year than last year from farming class, due to the fact that the farmers can not purchase and pay for the material; therefore it can not be demand that is putting up the price of the material.

The South needs to be relieved from this Nitrate Trust, a trust that absolutely dictates to the South what price she will have to pay for one of her chief plant foods. Let "Henry" do it.

Very truly, C. E. JONES.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to have printed in connection with my remarks some letters that I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing some letters. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters follow:

SPRINGFIELD, S. C., February 2, 1922.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HAMP: I am writing to ask you for a little assistance in getting a matter straightened out with the railroad company.

I am shipping hogs to the Richmond and Baltimore markets, and the Southern road refuses to furnish me with double-decked cars or allow me to build a double deck in ones they furnish.

I have taken the matter up with the South Carolina Railroad Commission and they state that they can not handle this, as it is interstate business.

I presume the proper authorities to take the matter up with is the Interstate Commerce Commission. Could you see them in Washington and get a ruling which I could use with the railroad company and have them cite me to tariffs which cover this phase of the hog-shipping business?

Other shippers are using double-decked cars from points in South Carolina and Georgia to the Richmond and Baltimore markets, and their freights are about half what mine are.

Thanking you for your assistance in the matter and with best wishes, I am,

Yours, truly, H. A. JUMPER.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY SYSTEM,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1922.

Col. F. G. ROBBINS,
Director Bureau of Service,
Interstate Commerce Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR COL. ROBBINS: I have your letter of the 4th instant, File 126632, complaints submitted by the Hon. H. P. FULMER, from Mr. H. A. Jumper, of Springfield, S. C.

The tariff in which the restrictions occur is the one issued by J. J. Cottrell, agent, Richmond, Va., effective October 15, 1921, tariff No. 2, I. C. C. No. 358, eastbound Carolina class and commodity tariff from local and junction points in Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia to eastern cities and interior eastern points in the States of Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Virginia, and West Virginia. Page 33, note 37, paragraph 1, reads:

"Loading hogs, calves, or cattle in double-deck cars will not be permitted."

This tariff applies to all roads in the States named, but I will be very glad to investigate further the claim that other shippers are using double-deck cars from points in South Carolina and Georgia to the Richmond and Baltimore markets, and will appreciate further information from Mr. Jumper in regard to it.

Yours, sincerely,
W. S. ANDREWS,
Assistant to Vice President.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1922.

Mr. GEORGE B. MCGINTY,
Secretary, Interstate Commerce Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCGINTY: I received a letter from Mr. F. G. Robbins, Director of Service, under date of the 8th, in reply to my letter of the 4th regarding information as to the shipping of hogs from South Carolina.

Mr. Robbins states that due to a tariff "issued by J. J. Cottrell, agent, Richmond, Va., effective October 15, 1921 (No. I. C. C. 358), Eastbound Carolina Class and Commodity Tariff." shippers of hogs from South Carolina, Georgia, Virginia, and North Carolina shipping to eastern cities and certain interior eastern points are forbidden or prevented from shipping hogs in double-decked cars.

I asked Mr. Robbins over the phone why this special order against certain Southern States and he has referred me to you.

The shipping point in question is Williston, S. C., to Richmond, Va. I called up Mr. King, who represents the Southern Railroad here, for a rate on car shipments of hogs to and from the points named, and he quoted me $73.50 per car, standard size, or $92 for double-decked cars.

You, of course, understand that twice as many hogs can be shipped in the double-decked car; therefore without the double-decked car there is a loss of $55 on each car shipped.

I am writing to ask what authority Mr. J. J. Cottrell has to issue said tariff against shippers in the States mentioned, and if you can assist me in having this changed. If there is no other way out of it I shall have to make an appeal to Congress against this discrimination on the part of the roads in favor of shippers from other sections. The people of South Carolina and other States as well are facing bankruptcy on account of a short cotton crop and low prices, and they are turning to hog raising in an effort to relieve the situation, and I feel that the order against double-decked cars is unjust and a serious handicap to the raiser of hogs.

I am deeply interested in this matter and will appreciate any help or information that you may give me.

Very respectfully,
H. P. FULMER, M. C.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to use any more time this evening?

Mr. SISSON. No; I have no one else who wishes to speak to-night.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution by the patients of Mount Alto Hospital with regard to certain things that come under the Veterans' Bureau, and certain legislation indorsed by the American Legion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, is this in the nature of a petition?

Mr. FULMER. It is a resolution by the patients in Mount Alto Hospital.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not customary to drop these things in the regular way in the basket and have them referred to the proper committee? I do not like to object, but I think it would be better to dispose of it in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington objects.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10871, the Army appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent Mr. OLIVER (at the request of Mr. MCDUFFIE) was given leave of absence for five days, on account of official business.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois when it is his intention to call it up?

Mr. MADDEN. I was hoping we might get unanimous consent to-morrow, notwithstanding it is Calendar Wednesday, for the reason that $94,000,000 appropriated in this bill is for the Veterans' Bureau and their fund for rehabilitation and vocational training will be exhausted to-morrow. They will not be able to send their checks out unless this is disposed of.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, may I submit a unanimous-consent request? I ask unanimous consent that on to-morrow after the conclusion of the consideration of the bill to be presented by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, it shall be in order to take up and consider conference reports on bills from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that on to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday, after consideration of bills presented by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization it shall be in order to take up for consideration conference reports on appropriation bills. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I have had no opportunity to confer with the minority members about the condition of conference reports. I want to ask the gentlemen if they can not transfer Calendar Wednesday business to Thursday?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say that there will be no objection from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] as to the consideration of this conference report to-morrow if the House agrees to it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There are a number of conference reports.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I had two conference reports in mind, both of which I understand the minority are willing to have taken up. One is this conference report and the other is the conference report on the independent offices.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it a complete agreement or do we have to vote on several provisions?

Mr. MONDELL. I think there are some provisions to be voted upon.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman from Wyoming is it particularly important to have the business of Calendar Wednesday considered to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Washington can answer that, perhaps.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say now that I do not think that that is important.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It depends on how often the committee has a call on the calendar; it only comes up about once in the session.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So far as I know anything about that resolution it is wrong.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I disagree with the gentleman. It occurs to me, talking about the necessity of agreeing to the conference report, that if it was agreed to the President is not here and could not sign it.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that the President is to be back Friday, and there is a disagreement in this, so that it will have to go back to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think the bill in reference to immigration can be handled in two hours and a half. I will not object to Calendar Wednesday being transferred to Thursday.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Calendar Wednesday business may be in order on Thursday instead of on Wednesday, and that we dispense with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that business in order to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday, may be in order on Thursday and that Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that would mean that the Army appropriation bill would go on to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. The conference reports would first be considered to-morrow, and I assume that would be the wish of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Then the balance of the day, if there was time remaining, would be utilized by the subcommittee now considering the measure before the House.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman from Wyoming if there is any intention of having in the near future a Private Calendar day? There are some little bills that are not claims, that are not war claims, that are not pensions, but which are of considerable importance to some of us locally.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope that before long we may have another day for the consideration of matters on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

H. J. Res. 227. Joint resolution extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of five years from March 21, 1922.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 15, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 9, 1922.)

The Senate met in open executive session at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

EXTENSION OF DEBT DUE FOR AUSTRIAN RELIEF.

As in legislative session,

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, from the Committee on Finance I report favorably with amendments the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 160) authorizing the extension, for a period of not to exceed 25 years, of the time for the payment of the principal and interest of the debt incurred by Austria September 4, 1920, for the purchase of wheat from the United States Grain Corporation, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 561) thereon.

Mr. PITTMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the joint resolution which has just been reported by the Senator from North Dakota may be read.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I have made that request, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr ROBINSON. Mr. President, let us have an explanation of the joint resolution. I endeavored to hear it when it was read, but was unable to do so.

Mr. LODGE. I will state the object of the joint resolution in a few words. The joint resolution has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Finance. The Senator from Arkansas will remember that three years ago, I think, after the World War, Congress appropriated $50,000,000 in the form of wheat for the relief of certain of the starving populations in Europe. The principal part of that relief went to Vienna, where undoubtedly there was greater suffering than at any other one place. The United States Grain Corporation took the notes of the Government of Austria, secured by certain of its revenues. The purpose of the joint resolution is to extend the time for the payment of the principal and interest of that debt for the period of 25 years. It is entirely different from the credits granted by the United States to other countries. This was purely a matter of charity. I do not suppose when the debt was incurred that anybody expected it would ever be paid, but we hold these notes and the revenues are held back from the Austrian Government as security for the debt. The purpose of the joint resolution is to give that Government time within which to pay the debt so that they may meanwhile use for the purpose of constructing public works and to relieve the starving population of Vienna the revenues which are now held as security.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Massachusetts has, I believe, stated that the joint resolution has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it has been reported unanimously by the Finance Committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. My colleague, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], is not present, and I do not know whether or not he desires to be heard in connection with the joint resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. The colleague of the Senator from North Carolina is in favor of the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator's colleague supports the joint resolution. There is no objection to it of which I am aware.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	McNary	Simmons

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the following Senators are detained from the Senate because of attendance upon the Committee on Finance:

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present The Secretary will state the amendments reported by the committee.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 6, after the name "Austria," to strike out "September 4, 1920"; in line 7, before the word "from," to strike out "wheat" and insert "flour"; in line 12, after the word "that," to insert the words "substantially all"; in line 13, before the name "France," to insert "Denmark"; in line 13, after the name "Italy," to strike out

"Japan" and insert "Norway"; in line 14, after the name "Rumania," to insert "Sweden, Switzerland"; and in line 15, before the name "Austria," to strike out "loans to" and insert "claims against," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to extend, for a period not to exceed 25 years, the time of payment of the principal and interest of the debt incurred by Austria for the purchase of flour from the United States Grain Corporation, and to release Austrian assets pledged for the payment of such loan, in whole or in part, as may, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, be necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of this resolution: Provided, however, That substantially all the other creditor nations, to wit: Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Great Britain, Greece, Holland, Italy, Norway, Rumania, Sweden, Switzerland, and Yugoslavia shall take action with regard to their respective claims against Austria similar to that herein set forth. The Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to decide when this proviso has been substantially complied with.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the joint resolution provides for the cancellation of the interest?

Mr. LODGE. It provides for the extension of the time of payment of principal and interest for 25 years.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no cancellation of the principal and interest involved?

Mr. LODGE. No; they are not canceled.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator what other nations are doing with their claims against Austria?

Mr. LODGE. They have all agreed to grant the same extension, and our action under the joint resolution is contingent upon their doing so.

Mr. KING. Are the claims of the other nations for money advanced, and are they in addition to the reparations which may have been awarded?

Mr. LODGE. The joint resolution concerns a gift made by a number of nations, including France, Italy, Great Britain, and the United States, all of which advanced sums of money for the relief of the suffering and the starving men, women, and children of Vienna. We extended relief in the form of wheat through the American Grain Corporation, which had then a profit to its account of $50,000,000. Twenty-four million dollars went for the relief of conditions in Vienna and the remainder went to Poland and some other countries where people were starving.

The joint resolution does not relate to a war credit. The object of the joint resolution is simply to extend the time for the payment of principal and interest for 25 years, to enable the Government of Austria to use the revenues which have been pledged for these loans for public works and other purposes.

The distress in Vienna, I presume, has been greater than at any other place in Europe. The wheat given by us was all exhausted. Children to the number of some 400,000 have been supported by charity from the United States and Great Britain principally but also from other countries. This extension is made contingent upon the agreement of all the other countries to take similar action.

Mr. KING. I am in entire sympathy with the object of the joint resolution, but I was wondering if at the same time France and Great Britain or the allied and associated powers were taking any action with respect to the war debt or were granting any extensions of it.

Mr. LODGE. They are making an extension as to this debt, which arises from a gift or a loan, as we propose to do.

Mr. KING. But the Senator is not advised as to whether they are making an extension in any way or contemplate making an extension of their war claims.

Mr. LODGE. The items under the joint resolution do not come within the war debt.

Mr. KING. I understand that.

Mr. LODGE. The money was advanced subsequent to the war, purely for charity.

Mr. KING. I am aware of that.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the joint resolution does not provide for the cancellation of interest, but it extends the payment of interest and principal, as I understand, for 25 years.

Mr. LODGE. The joint resolution simply extends the time for the payment of principal and interest for 25 years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a few remarks in connection with the pending joint resolution.

I know the city of Vienna very well and I love it very much. In no part of Europe have the people suffered such hardships as have the people of the old town by the Danube. Virtually when the map of Europe was rearranged a new Austria was formed, which consisted chiefly of the city of Vienna, and from that city were cut off all of its accustomed lines of communication for procuring food and for the development of its trade.

The population of Vienna is one of the most delightful in the world, combining the softness of the southerner with the vivacity of the French. I am emphatically in favor of this joint resolution. If I had any objection to it at all, I would express it by saying that I would rather vote to forgive the debt instead of voting to postpone it. We furnished food for these people, principally the women and children, and I do not much like to be put in the attitude of charging for it. It ought to come from us and France and Italy and Great Britain as a charity. I doubt if the people of Vienna would have accepted it in that form as gladly as they did in the shape of a loan, but I hope that there will not be a single vote against the proposition to postpone the payment of this debt.

America now and then has risen to splendid heights in her magnificent charity; she has given to Russia and to the islands of the West Indies which have been destroyed by volcano and sometimes by earthquake; all over the world our money has gone to help relieve distress. We are being charged in some quarters now with having the gold of the world and sitting on it by refusing to let it go to the help of anybody else. No charge ever was less founded, nor any attack upon a people less justified than that attack upon us. I hope that some day, if the Viennese shall continue to be in as bad a fix as they now are and should need relief as much as they do now, we will forgive this debt and let it go.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think there is one matter that needs a little explanation that has not been touched upon. We not only required the Austrian Government to give us her bond bearing 6 per cent interest, but in that bond it was provided that this debt should be a lien upon the assets and income of the Austrian Government, and all other Governments who made like advances of flour or other things took the same kind of a contract; and it was agreed by all of them that when Austria paid any portion she would have to pay a moiety in equal percentage of the amount to all of the other Governments which made the advances.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. We have received, of course, no interest on the principal, and Austria has not an income sufficient to function as a Government, and we are releasing that lien on condition that all of the other countries who joined with us will also release their liens, and also that any of those entitled to reparation under the Versailles treaty will also release their liens upon the income of the Austrian Government, so that the Government can function and so that she can borrow money, if necessary, to feed her own people.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just answered the question which I was going to ask.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask permission to insert in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a letter from Mr. Edward A. Filene, and also a general statement on this subject which he attaches to the letter.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the letter and statement to which the Senator from North Dakota refers were printed in the RECORD a few days ago upon my request. I see no objections, however, to their being reprinted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WM. FILENE'S SONS CO.,
OFFICE OF PRESIDENT,
Boston, February 27, 1922.

Hon. PORTER J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Even though I know that as a member of the Senate Finance Committee your time and strength are taxed by hearings in preparation for tariff legislation, I venture to address you in behalf of Austria and to urge a prompt and favorable report of the bill introduced by Senator LODGE, S. J. Res. 160.

Hundreds of thousands of the people of Austria are at the door of starvation and will perish of hunger and the diseases that accompany starvation unless early relief is obtained. The American Congress and people intended, when two years ago they gave Austria the $24,000,000 credit with the United States Grain Corporation, actually to save her people, and never intended that their loan should result in tying her hands and rendering her helpless with the result that the starvation of her people would only be delayed.

The situation now is vastly worse than when the loan was made. I visited Austria last summer and early autumn, and have been in close touch with the situation there since that time. My last report was from the American Friends Service Committee, and was received only a few days ago. The months between now and the coming harvest will be the worst that Austria has experienced.

The door to relief should be opened at once by release of the assets pledged to payment of this and like loans from other nations. I am credibly informed that all the other creditor nations, either by formal action or through diplomatic channels, have assured Austria that they would take the action proposed by Senator LODGE'S resolution, but whether or not this information is correct as regards all of them we are not justified in delaying favorable action until all others have relinquished their claims. The bill provides, as you will no doubt notice, that the release of the assets shall take effect only when all the others have also waived their liens.

As an act of charity and mercy, I urge that this bill be reported and passed at once. I am in touch with the sentiment on this subject throughout the country, and am convinced that the people of all sections will support you in the proposed action. Won't you be good enough to let me know your attitude on the bill and what the action of the committee is likely to be?

Very sincerely, yours, EDWARD A. FILENE.

P. S.: I inclose with this letter a brief statement covering the whole situation, which you may care to refer to.

LEGISLATIVE RELIEF FOR AUSTRIA'S STARVING PEOPLE.

THE HISTORY OF RELIEF PLANS.

As long ago as March 17 last the Supreme Council of the Allies, meeting at London, after conference with an official commission from Austria, in which a plan for the financial and material rehabilitation of Austria was under discussion, asked the financial committee of the League of Nations "to meet within the following fortnight, examine the financial situation of Austria, and seek means of remedying it."

At the same time that the supreme council made this request the Governments represented in the meeting, namely, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, to all of which Austria was owing money secured by a lien on the Austrian State assets, agreed "to release for a period of years, to be determined later, their liens under the treaty of St. Germain in respect of claims against the Austrian Government for the cost of armies of occupation, for relief-credit bonds, and reparations, provided other interested Governments will agree to similar postponement."

The committee of the League of Nations which was requested to make the inquiry and report was a most competent one. As requested by the supreme council, it met in Paris from March 28 to 31, where, in conference with the official commission from Austria that had previously conferred with the supreme council, it considered the whole situation.

It then sent a delegation to Vienna, which from April 15 to May 12 studied the situation on the ground, conferred with officials and leading financial men of Austria, with representatives of all the political parties in Austria, and formulated its report.

On May 31 the financial committee, having considered the report of their delegation to Austria, rendered a report to the Supreme Council of the Allies, which closed with the following words: "The committee * * * have approved a program of financial action competent in their opinion to restore the Austrian economy. Temporary advances to initiate this program are assured. It rests with the Governments concerned to allow the work to be undertaken on the conditions indicated in the committee's note of April 4."

The condition thus referred to in the committee's note of April 4 that would "allow the work to be undertaken" was that other creditor Governments of Austria which had a lien on Austrian assets should agree to take action regarding the debts due them similar to action already taken by the powers represented in the London meeting of the Supreme Council of the Allies.

The program of financial action which, in the opinion of the financial committee, was "competent to restore the Austrian economy," included (a) negotiation of a foreign loan secured by ter Meulen bonds resting on the following assets of the Austrian Government: Customs receipts, revenues from the State tobacco monopoly and from forests and mortgages on all real estate of the country; (b) a reform of the currency to be effected by a strong and independent bank of issue; (c) the balancing of the budget; (d) the flotation of a substantial internal loan which should make it unnecessary to continue the issuance of paper money.

To this program the Austrian Government and the responsible leaders of all the parties of Austria had pledged themelves, as had also the bankers and leaders of finance and industry.

As the temporary advances necessary to put the plan into execution had been agreed upon, and as Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan had agreed to release their claims on the State assets of Austria in favor of the new foreign loan, it remained only for the other creditor nations to take like action.

Of these remaining creditor nations the United States was the chief creditor and most influential. It was generally understood that if we acted the other and smaller nations would also act, but since we failed to take action, other and minor creditors waited for us and the matter was delayed from month to month, during which time Austria drifted nearer and nearer to the financial collapse which finally has come.

STARVATION IN AUSTRIA REQUIRES IMMEDIATE RELIEF.

This delay creates a most dangerous situation for Austria. It requires only legislation by the United States to save the nation from the great dangers arising from unbearable conditions, and great masses of her people from starvation and death.

Usually the foremost in all philanthropic work, the United States in this case is holding up the procession led by the other powers. If countries such as Belgium and France, themselves cruelly ravaged by war, can favor this suspension of the Austrian debt, surely we can do so also—especially as Austria is utterly incapable of paying this debt or arrears of interest at present.

FEDERAL COUNCIL ASKS SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

On December 15 the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in view of the increasingly critical situation of the Austrian population, passed a formal resolution petitioning Congress to take separate action on Austria's debt to the United States. The council specifically petitioned that special and immediate legislation be enacted to the end that payment of Austria's debt of $24,000,000 be suspended for at least 20 years. The nations referred to above have already agreed to this arrangement.

The Federal Council has sent this petition to 150,000 churches in America, suggesting that the congregations take like action. Knowing first hand, as I do, the severe straits in which Austria finds herself, I am supplementing the campaign of the Federal Council in behalf of help to Austria by sending the facts and a covering petition to Congress, to influential leaders and organizations in every State of the Union.

AMERICAN INACTION PREVENTS RELIEF.

Our loan to Austria, enabling her to purchase from us $24,000,000 worth of flour, was authorized under special act of Congress, March, 1920. Payment for those foodstuffs, according to the act, must be made within five years.

The failure of Congress to authorize deferment of this debt, a debt which Austria is absolutely incapable of paying at the present time, is holding up a new international loan which would place Austria in a position of physical and economic rebirth.

Yet this debt of $24,000,000, contracted solely for the purchase of foodstuffs to relieve a starving people, is lumped in with a debt of over $11,000,000,000 owed to the United States by all the European debtor countries for purchases of war materials as well as of foodstuffs.

AUSTRIA IS STARVING.

In the meanwhile Austria starves. In the midst of a bitter winter her people are suffering from disease, starvation, and death. The situation is extremely critical. The crown, which before the war was worth 20 cents, is now quoted in Vienna at one one-hundredth of a cent; that is, where before the war 5 crowns would buy a dollar, 10,000 are at this date needed to buy a dollar or its equivalent in merchandise. Even in its own country the purchasing value of the crown has fallen so low that a 10-cent loaf of bread costs, according to the normal value of the crown, over $200.

As an American keenly interested in the rehabilitation of a world torn now by the peace as it was formerly by the war, and after personal study of conditions in Austria, I am taking the liberty to write you this digest of Austria's situation, and to suggest a remedy in the form of special action by Congress. The inclosed resolution is the one approved by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and by other national organizations.

EDWARD A. FILENE.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, there is a very interesting and illuminating article—a short one—in The Nation's Business on the Austrian problem, which I should like to have inserted in the RECORD in connection with the proceedings on this joint resolution, which I trust will be speedily enacted into law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

[From The Nation's Business, Oct. 5, 1921.]

THE AUSTRIAN PROBLEM.

Austria is the crux of the central-European problem and the large question it presents practically revolves about Vienna. Here is a city of 2,000,000, one of the finest capitals of the world, which was the center of operations for an empire of 40,000,000 people.

Austria now has within her new borders approximately 6,500,000, practically cut off from free trading relations with her neighbors and no longer the recognized clearing house for their business. A city of the size of Vienna can not be maintained easily as a going concern by so small a national population. Austria does not raise food enough to live on. She must import coal as well as a large part of the other raw materials she needs. With tariffs and embargoes on every side, the restriction of her business is obvious. Further, burdened with thousands of refugees from the east, only charity from the United States and elsewhere has kept her population alive.

In the face of these vicissitudes her improvement during the past year has been remarkable. The country is now enjoying a certain hectic activity, which is greatly influenced by the low state of her money and the bargains which the country offers to foreign buyers. The contrast of the present scale of living, although low, to that which the country suffered so long is such that her workers are reasonably satisfied.

Communism has disappeared and the present government, in spite of its many difficulties, is functioning with a considerable degree of satisfaction to its people. All of the rival political parties have joined in support of the present ministry.

The most serious problem the municipality of Vienna has to deal with is that affecting nearly half a million people of the middle classes, formerly government officials, pensioners, small professional people, and tradesmen, as well as those who before the war lived on small incomes from investments. There is no need for the large official group maintained in government departments on a scale necessary to care for the affairs of 40,000,000 people. The crown has so depreciated in value that its purchasing power permits these people barely to exist. As in Germany, the workers whose wages have increased are far better off than the people of this class.

The workers realize this fact and are fairly content with their lot, although a large number of them are working on a part-time basis. Under laws passed some time ago the industries are not permitted to discharge employees freely. Many of them are carrying an abnormal number of employees. The wage is so low, however, in comparison to that of more fortunate countries, that this expense is not as serious as it might appear to be, and the costs of manufacturing in Austria are low almost beyond comprehension.

Little by little the very small factories employing workers in highly skilled trades are finding themselves and increasing their output. The results of their handiwork are of such artistic value and the prices so low that the foreign demand is good.

Superficially, conditions in Vienna appear to be much better than they really are. It is not until one finds that 400,000 children and other dependents are still being fed daily through charity that the real situation becomes apparent.

There is reason to believe that even with its restricted territory Austria can and will recover and be able to maintain a life of some promise for its people if it receives essential aid from outside in strengthening its finances and restoring its currency. A prerequisite to its future is the establishment of something like prewar relations with its neighbors.

Vienna has many advantages as a trade center for central Europe, and is so placed in relation to the transportation system that it can conduct a substantial part of the business with less expense and greater efficiency than any other near-by center. The countries contiguous to it are at last coming to realize this, and a constructive plan might be carried forward with the aid of the more powerful nations which would promise a satisfactory solution of the problem of Vienna and Austria.

Next to the restoration of peace and cooperation in the western part of the continent comes the necessity for the establishment of like conditions in central Europe. One reacts on the other to such an extent that they are almost inseparable.

AUSTRIAN INDEBTEDNESS AND THE UNITED STATES.

The financial situation in Austria is most difficult. It has been the subject of study on the part of an international commission constituted as a result of the international financial conference held in Brussels in the fall of 1920. This commission evolved a plan for improving the situation which contemplates relief for the Austrian Government by a loan and by reform of its fiscal system.

The conditions have been accepted by the Austrian Government, and immediate help to the extent of some $20,000,000, with additional funds in prospect, has been pledged, dependent upon agreement by the countries holding obligations of the Austrian Government to defer payment of their claims for a reasonable period.

All of the countries involved except Italy and the United States have agreed to deferment. Italy, it is understood, has agreed to postpone her claim if the United States takes similar action. Only the approval of the United States is necessary, therefore, to make this scheme operative and give to Austria the relief required to enable her to buy food for her people to carry them through the coming winter.

The debt of Austria to the United States is in the form of obligations to the United States Grain Corporation incurred for foodstuffs. At present no official of the United States has authority to defer this payment, but such authority is contemplated in legislation now pending in Congress. The whole program, in so far as Austria is concerned, has been delayed for some months because the United States has not acted.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE UNITED STATES.

To-day the world's business has apparently reached a dead center. It may move forward from the present point by slow, painful, and uncertain steps, with the result that the process of reconstruction will extend over many years. How long such movement would continue it is impossible to forecast. No one was able to approximate the length of the most destructive war in history, and no one is wise enough to foresee how long the present condition of doubt and insecurity with its inevitable suffering and social disturbances may last.

Only by gaining the confidence of investors can the credit and capital necessary to insure normal business in the world be mobilized and used. Only the free exchange of commodities between the countries in increasing volume can bring normal life to the people and the conditions they knew before the war.

The United States is regarded as the most powerful country in the world, commercially and financially. Its reputation for integrity and fair dealing is well established. In every country your committee visited and in almost every conference in which it participated, irrespective of the occupation, official position, or social status of the persons met, the opinion was expressed that neither western nor central Europe can be restored to a condition which promises hope and progress for the future without our active assistance.

Possessing as it does great quantities of raw material and manufactures which it wishes to exchange with other nations, the interest of the United States in accelerating a return to world prosperity is vital.

The fact is not debatable that after the part we have taken in the late war we can not refrain from actively participating in the settlement of the economic and financial difficulties now confronting the world.

Every country desires our friendship and assistance, and it is apparent we can participate in the restoration of commerce and industrial productivity on any reasonable and consistent terms, either by modification of the Versailles treaty to meet the policies of the United States or independently of it.

Doubtless it was the realization of our moral as well as of our financial and commercial responsibility in relieving the world's depressed condition that caused the President to call the proposed conference in Washington to consider the reduction of armaments.

Any student of world affairs can not escape the conclusion that each of the nations, including the United States, can not continue to expend so large a part of its entire revenue, derived from taxation which is almost unbearable, in preparation for future war if the present civilization is to continue. To peace and to the restoration of the world's economic balance we must give our attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to be proposed? If not, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was amended so as to read:

Whereas the economic structure of Austria is approaching collapse and great numbers of the people of Austria are in consequence in imminent danger of starvation and threatened by diseases growing out of extreme privation and starvation; and

Whereas this Government wishes to cooperate in relieving Austria from the immediate burden created by her outstanding debts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the preamble as amended will be agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the extension for a period of not to exceed 25 years of the time for the payment of the principal and interest of the debt incurred by Austria for the purchase of flour from the United States Grain Corporation, and for other purposes."

FOREIGN COMMERCE STATISTICS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting draft of a proposed bill to consolidate the work of collecting, compiling, and publishing foreign trade statistics in the Department of Commerce by transferring the office known as the Bureau of Customs Statistics, located in the New York Customhouse, and now under jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, from that department to the Department of Commerce, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRANCE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Maryland, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

STATE OF MARYLAND,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Philip B. Perlman, secretary of state of the State of Maryland, under and by virtue of the authority vested in me by section 59 of article 35 of the Annotated Code of Maryland, do hereby certify that the following is a full, true, and correct copy of joint resolution No. 5 of the General Assembly of Maryland of 1922, as the same as taken from and compared with the original * * * now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and have caused to be affixed the official seal of the secretary of state, at Annapolis, Md., this 8th day of March, in the year 1922.

[SEAL.] PHILIP B. PERLMAN,
Secretary of State.

A joint resolution (No. 5) requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Maryland to endeavor to have the Indianhead Naval Proving Ground reestablished, and the ordnance machinery and equipment returned thereto from Dahlgren, Va..

Whereas the people of Charles County are suffering, in common with those of the rest of the State of Maryland, from low prices of their main products and the continued high prices of all commodities needful for their subsistence; which fact makes all unnecessary taxation bear oppresively upon them; and

Whereas a large area of said county's real estate, adjacent to which is located the United States Naval Proving Ground at Indianhead, Md., has been reduced very greatly in value, entailing direct financial loss to the several hundred owners of same, necessarily and materially increasing the taxes of the people of the entire county and also affecting the State's revenue, by the cessation of ordnance operations at the said proving ground and transferring them to Dahlgren, Va., after the former plant had proved its adequate capacity for supplying all demands upon it during the World War; and

Whereas the site at Dahlgren was commandeered as an emergency measure during the said war to be used exclusively for long-range gun testing, but was not so used, nor at all, until the war had ceased, and the said transference of naval ordnance work, originally established at the cost of some millions of dollars derived through taxation, has been shown to be unnecessary from the view point of governmental necessity; and

Whereas the completion of said transference would impose further taxation upon the people of the entire country; and

Whereas the dismantling of and removal of the machinery and equipment from the Indianhead Proving Ground was begun and hastened forward without apparent emergency need, and without the knowledge or sanction of Congress; and

Whereas some hundreds of citizens, and their families, of the State of Maryland and elsewhere, but principally of Charles County, formerly the Indianhead Proving Ground employees, have suffered heavy financial loss, in cases to the extent of their total earnings, as the result of the abandonment of the same, after having been prevailed upon by the naval authorities to forsake their accustomed occupations and procure homes by purchase generally, in order, as they were induced to believe on such usually competent authority, that they might become more permanent and valuable to the Government as its employees; and

Whereas the unsettled conditions prevailing in all parts of the country and the heavy taxation borne by the people as a result of the war impose upon the Government the imperative duty of refraining from unnecessary expenditure of public money: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the Senators and Representatives of Maryland in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, requested to support and use all means in their power, deemed by them expedient and proper, to have the Indianhead Naval Proving Ground reestablished and continued upon the basis of its former status at Indianhead, Md., and which it possessed prior to the time any portion of its ordnance machinery and equipment was transferred as above mentioned; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Maryland be and he is hereby requested to immediately transmit, under the great seal of this State, a copy of the aforegoing resolution and memorial to each of the Senators and Representatives now in the Congress of the United States from the State of Maryland.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes; that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and concurred therein with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; that the House insisted upon its amendments numbered 26 and 27, agreed to the further conference requested by the Senate, and had appointed Mr. MADDEN, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add, at the end of article 1, the following:

> If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties and any other power or powers having possessions in the region of the Pacific a controversy arising out of any Pacific question involving said insular rights and possessions, threatening war, which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, the high contracting parties shall invite said other power or powers to a joint conference to which the whole subject shall be referred for consideration.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this amendment is quite similar to the amendment that was offered on yesterday by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. The distinction is this: In the amendments referred to it was provided that any or all powers interested in any controversy in the Pacific should be invited to the conference. My amendment limits it to other powers having possessions in the Pacific region. The amendments to which I refer did not limit the controversy to Pacific questions. My amendment limits it to Pacific questions. The amendments which were acted upon yesterday included the words "and adjustment." I have left out of this amendment the words "and adjustment."

Mr. President, I am offering this amendment because I heard some criticism of the other amendments on the ground that they were too broad in their scope, that they took in the whole world. I do not agree with that criticism, but nevertheless it affected the minds of some Senators; whether sufficiently to cause them to vote one way or another I do not know. This amendment limits it practically to four additional powers—China, Russia, the Netherlands, and Portugal—without mentioning those names.

There has been some objection, also, to the fact that this change in the treaty is attempted to be made by amendment. Mr. President, I think it must be made by amendment. I know that Senators draw a distinction in their minds between a reservation and an amendment, and of course there is a distinction. We can place in this treaty a reservation stating that any particular provision does not affect us, but that does not reach the difficulty in this case. It is not a question as to whether we shall enter into a conference with controverting powers.

It is not a question whether the United States has the right to withdraw from the conference, or whether the United States has the right to invite a conference. The question is, Will the powers who are liable to bring about this controversy permit a conference between the parties engaged in the controversy?

There is in this whole treaty but one provision for a conference—just one—and that is a conference between the parties to this treaty. If there is a controversy threatening war between one of these powers and an outside power, what provision is there in this treaty looking to the prevention of that war? Not a single provision in it. Is it the intention of the Senate to ratify a treaty that does not tend in any way or furnish any machinery to settle a controversy between these four powers and an outside party that may result in war? Is it not perfectly evident that the danger of war in the Pacific is greater between one of these four powers and an outside power than it is between any of the powers that are parties to the treaty?

The declaration in this treaty is that it is for the purpose of preserving peace in the Pacific region. Should we not make an attempt to prevent war from arising in the Pacific region, no matter whom the controversy may be between?

Let us assume, for the purpose of argument, that after the signing of this treaty a controversy which threatens war does arise between Japan and Russia. Is there any provision in this treaty by which that controversy may be considered and adjusted? Not a thing. If, for instance, after we have signed this treaty a controversy that threatens war arises between Japan and China, is there any provision in this treaty that provides for the consideration of that controversy and its adjustment? Not at all; and yet article 2 of this treaty provides for the joint or separate use of force against any outside aggression.

Are we to sit down quietly as a party to this treaty and wait until the controversy reaches the point where there is outside aggression before we act? That is what this treaty asks us to do. It provides, in article 2:

> If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

The only provision in this treaty with regard to outside controversies is a provision to meet aggression. Is that the way you want this treaty to stand? Oh, but I have heard Senators say that the United States can not be forced as a party into that fight unless it sees fit. Admit that that is true; admit that Congress alone can force us into a war; admit that we can violate our agreement through act of Congress; that is not the question I am now bringing to the attention of the Senate. The question is this: There is a provision to meet aggression, but there is no provision in this treaty to adjust the controversy before it reaches the point of aggression.

It is claimed that this is a peace treaty; that the whole object of it is to prevent war, to preserve peace. How can you stop war after war is started without engaging in it to some extent? Was it not the policy of the covenant of the League of Nations to prevent war by considering all controversies that arise before they have reached the point of aggression? Does this instrument have for its purpose the prevention of war, the same as the covenant of the League of Nations? When they provide for the consideration and adjustment of disputes between the signatory powers is that following the peaceful purpose of the covenant of the League of Nations? If so, why do they not go further? Why do they not say that all controversies that may lead to war, not only between the signatory powers but between the signatory powers and others having possessions in the Pacific, shall be settled in the same way? There can be only one answer to it, and that is that this is not a treaty for the prevention of war, but is a treaty for the winning of war. There can not be anything else to it.

The able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] the other day called attention to the fact that the covenant of the League of Nations offers a remedy. Does it offer a remedy? The covenant of the League of Nations provides that the members of that league may, through the council, invite the controverting nations to come together to consider that question. But, mind you, if this instrument is gotten up for any purpose at all, it is because we are not a member of the League of Nations. The other three powers that are members of the League of Nations can act through the League of Nations. We are not a member of the League of Nations. Therefore they have gotten up this regional understanding so that the United States may participate in maintaining peace in the Pacific.

Now this question arises here: The United States, as a signatory to this treaty, undoubtedly would invite in Russia in the event that there was a controversy between any of these powers and Russia. The United States undoubtedly would invite in China in the event that there was a controversy between any of these powers and China; but what right has the United States to invite in those powers unless the other powers consent to it?

This treaty acts through unanimous consent. We know that the United States could not compel the signatory powers to invite any other power to a conference without the consent of the other three. If that is not true, then the contention that this is entirely by unanimous consent is not well founded, and then a majority controls. The United States, in the event of a controversy between Japan and Russia or Japan and China, might say to the signatory powers, "You should invite the other powers in here, so that we may ascertain what their complaint is, and see if we can adjust it"; but the other powers might say, "We do not care about our enemies being in this conference." The United States might say, "Then we withdraw from the conference"; but does it stop war if the United States withdraws from the conference? We do not want the United States to withdraw from any conference over a controversy threatening war in the Pacific. There could not be a war in the Pacific without vitally threatening our own interests. It is very doubtful if there could be a great war in the Pacific that we could keep out of. It is not a question whether we have a right to withdraw from the conference; what we want to know now in this treaty is whether it is the purpose of this treaty to consider and adjust in a peaceful way any controversies that threaten war in the Pacific. If that is the purpose of it, it is evident that this treaty does not provide the machinery. It is evident that unless the controverting parties are brought in to state their case, there is no way of adjusting it.

In the event of a controversy to-day between China and Japan which threatened war, what would be the result under this treaty? The four powers would meet to decide on what measures should be taken against the aggression from China. Is there any way of getting at China's side of the case? Japan comes in before that conference and says, "There are certain acts of China which constitute an aggression and threaten war." Is that true, or is it not true? They hear only one side of it. The injustice of that is apparent. Anyone who is familiar with the practice in civilized countries under law knows that you have to hear both sides. But under this treaty you hear only one side of it.

However, there is something even worse than that. Suppose a controversy arose between China and Japan over Shantung, and over the provisions of these very treaties we are now asked to ratify, and that controversy was getting to such a stage that it was threatening an aggression on the part of China against Japan. What could we do? Would we have to sit quietly down and wait until that had developed into an aggression? If not, what provision is there in this treaty by which we could stop that aggression? There is not a thing. Unless you place in this treaty a provision that these powers shall call in China in that event, and discuss the cause of her complaint, then you have no means whatever of ascertaining what the cause of the controversy is, and therefore you have no means of offering any remedy for that controversy.

Mr. President, it is perfectly evident that no analysis of this treaty is going to accomplish any purpose so far as this body is concerned. I am not discussing this question for that purpose at all. There are Senators in this body to-day who are reading more intently the signs of the public sentiment of the voters in their communities than they are the conditions and the results of this treaty upon the future of this country.

Propaganda has been started everywhere, as it has always started in these cases. Great church bodies, through executive committees, composed probably of a dozen men or women claiming to represent several hundred thousand men and women in this country, are signing resolutions for the ratification of this treaty as it is. They are honest people, but how many of those several thousand ever read this treaty? How many of those executive committees ever read this treaty? Every one of those who signed these resolutions is undoubtedly moved by the most intense desire for peace. They think this treaty provides the machinery for the prevention of war. Do Senators think for one moment that these Christian people, that these intelligent business organizations throughout the country, would indorse the ratification of this treaty in the form in which it now is if they realized that there is no provision in the treaty whatever for a conference between the disputants, unless the dispute is between the parties to this treaty?

Do Senators suppose for one moment that they would ask for the ratification of this treaty if they knew that there was no opportunity under this treaty to consider a dispute between Japan and Russia, or Japan and China, until after it had reached a stage where there was a physical aggression against Japan? Never in the world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator yield until I inquire of the Senator from Alabama about the matter of which the Senator is talking?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield gladly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I observe the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] here as well. Both those Senators told us yesterday that the only reason for declining to accept the amendment proposed is that it might result in the rejection of the treaty by some of the other powers, and I understood there was not a word to be said in opposition to it except that. I would like to inquire now of the Senator from Alabama, because the limit of time yesterday did not permit me to do so, which one of the other three powers he thinks might be moved to reject the treaty if this amendment is adopted?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I dislike very much to trespass on somebody else's time in the midst of a speech, but if the Senator from Montana desires to have me make a statement at this time I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator to make a statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unfortunately, by the lack of time yesterday I was cut short in what I had to say.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was going to remark, if the Senator will permit me, that I would naturally think that peace and justice loving countries would be only too glad to accede to the incorporation of this principle, which, it seems to me, conforms to elementary justice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, yesterday I had only five minutes in which to address the Senate before the vote came, and I had to hasten with my statement. I said then to the Senator from Montana that I did not agree with the position he had taken—that under general international law governments were required to respect the rights of other governments. I wish that was international law, but I am equally satisfied that it is not international law. The whole history of the world and its controversies demonstrate in itself that that is not international law, that the power of a government is sovereign, and that sovereignty is only surrendered through the force of another power or by direct act and concession. Therefore I think it is necessary, when governments are willing to respect the rights of other governments, that they should say so by treaty or some mutual understanding.

What I said yesterday in reference to my position was that I did not object to the pending amendment in principle—somewhat in line with the suggestions made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]—because I stood for the unconditional ratification of the treaty of Versailles. In fact, I made the motion on the floor of the Senate for its unconditional ratification, and regret that my motion did not prevail.

The treaty of Versailles, carrying in its folds the League of Nations, sought to bring all civilized governments into the League of Nations, where each should be under an obligation to respect the rights of others. So far as I am personally concerned, I should be glad to see those principles announced and maintained as the governing principles of the nations of the world.

That can not be done, and is not done, in this treaty. Why? Because the nations of the world were not seated at the table of the peace conference. Agreements to be binding must be mutual. I think it will be conceded that this country has great generosity, because there is no nation in the annals of civilization which has been more generous in its recognition of the rights of other nations than the United States of America; but that is not true of many of the other nations of the world. They are willing to recognize in many cases the rights of other nations, but they expect a reciprocal agreement in return, and would be unwilling to sign a contract, if I understand their attitude, which undertook to bind them to recognize the rights of nations where those nations are not bound to respect their rights in return.

Is the Government, as a condition precedent to the ratification of this contract, to put within its folds a clause not only requiring ourselves, but the other three powers to the contract, to do certain things for other nations? The original term embraces all nations on the face of the earth, but the Senator from Nevada, I understand, has limited his proposal to those having possessions in the region of the Pacific. Of course, that term is broader than the treaty. The treaty relates to insular dominions and insular possessions in the region of the Pacific. The term of the Senator from Nevada would infer not only insular possessions and insular dominions, which are islands, but it would relate to the mainland.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is mistaken in the wording.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the Senator will correct me if I am. I only gathered that from his remarks.

Mr. PITTMAN. It still is limited to controversies arising out of any Pacific question involving insular rights or possessions. I only attempted to describe the other powers by saying that they must have possessions in the region of the Pacific.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to correct him slightly also. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the amendment offered by myself did indeed extend to all nations, but only to such questions as affected the insular possessions or dominions of those nations in the Pacific.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I misunderstood the Senator's amendment to that extent, as I heard it read.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator was quite correct in saying that it extended to all nations, but it extended only to those questions which affect the interests of those nations in their insular possessions in the Pacific.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I said, the pending amendment relates to questions involving nations which have insular possessions or insular dominions in the region of the Pacific. As far as I know the small islands lying off the coast of China would not come within that definition. Russia has one island possession in the region of the Pacific, the northern half of the isle of Sakhalin, which might come within the terms of the treaty. Our Government and the other Governments to this contract have refused to recognize the so-called existing government in Russia. We might be willing to say that we will enter into this contract with a government which we do not recognize. I doubt, though, whether the other parties to this contract would, and if they do not it means delay in the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is nothing in this amendment which anticipates any contract with any other powers. It simply states that these four powers will invite the other nation with whom one of them is having a controversy to a conference. It does not require any contract to invite anybody to do anything.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does to invite a nation.

Mr. PITTMAN. It does not require a contract with the nation you invite.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I said a while ago, Mr. President, when one nation offers an advantage or a right or a concession to another nation, as a rule it expects that that concession or right shall be recognized, and that is the right I am talking about.

If you put this amendment in the treaty, I do not say it will destroy the treaty but I say it may destroy the treaty. It is not of sufficient value to put in the treaty to take the chances of destroying it, because in fact it has, in my judgment, no value at all. When I say it has no value at all I want to explain why I say that. Of course, to the general principle that we should invite all nations to the council table, as I have already said, I was committed when I voted for the League of Nations, and I have no desire whatever to retract my committal. I have no apology to make for my vote, and I still stand on the same principle on which I stood when I voted for the ratification of the Versailles treaty and the confirmation of the League of Nations; but when I say that the amendment has no value I mean that it has no value because this four-power treaty was hardly signed before, at the request of the Government of the Netherlands, in order that their rights might be recognized in this matter, there was an immediate exchange of notes by the four powers to this treaty recognizing the rights of the Netherlands to their insular possessions, and, as I said in my speech, there is no difficulty whatever for any other power which has insular possessions and dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean making a similar request to these Governments and having them recognized within the terms of this treaty. If they would not recognize them, as they would not recognize Russia, they certainly would not ratify this treaty with that provision in it; and if they would recognize them, as they recognized the Government of the Netherlands and its possessions, then you would be putting a clause in the treaty which would mean nothing, because it would accomplish nothing.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator has two different questions that he is discussing. He is discussing the right or the propriety of inviting other nations into this conference, whether by signing this particular one or a separate one, giving them the same rights, which is the same thing. Of course, I do not know why the conference did not take the Netherlands into this group of four; we never will know. I do not know whether the Senator from Alabama knows; but it is a peculiar situation. You are willing to contract with the Netherlands to respect their rights, the same as you respect each other's rights, and yet you do not want them to get in the same group at the conference table, apparently.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that, so far as I know—and I think I do know as to that—there was no indicated desire on the part of the Government of the Netherlands to have a concession made under this four-power treaty until after it was made, and then the treaty was signed; but when their Government made the request for recognition it was granted by the four powers.

Mr. PITTMAN. Now I understand the matter better than I ever have before. This is something entirely new. After the four-power treaty was signed the Netherlands expressed a desire to get in, but it was too late, and consequently a separate agreement was made with the Netherlands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is in the record.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did it occur to any members of the American delegation that it would be a good idea to include the Netherlands with the other powers?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it did not. It was of no value to the United States of America to have them in.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would it not be desirable to have in this agreement as many powers as possible as have possessions in the Pacific?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I myself, personally, would like to have the United States a party to the only treaty in which nearly all the other powers are joined, but it was of no value to the United States to have the Netherlands in the four-power treaty, because no protection would result to the United States therefrom. The United States was glad to grant the desire of the Netherlands when the request was made; but of what value is it to the United States to have the Netherlands included in the treaty?

Mr. PITTMAN. I can conceive much of value in having the Netherlands included in this agreement. In the first place, the Netherlands is probably the only one of these countries, except ourselves, that has not a separate alliance with Japan. That is one thing.

There is another consideration. The interests of England in India and of Japan in her own insular possessions have tied those two countries mutually together at all times. The Netherlands as a small country has not perhaps the same influence as have those two great imperial empires, but the Netherlands we might imagine in some characters of dispute, while not having a great navy and army, might have a moral influence in the conference which would have its effect. What I have learned by the debate so far is something which was not learned before, that the Netherlands did want to be included in the treaty, and they were prevented from coming into the treaty on the ground that the treaty had already been signed before they made their request.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Nevada is misquoting me. I did not say what he has stated, and I can not allow the Senator to put those words in my mouth.

Mr. PITTMAN. What did the Senator from Alabama say?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said that at the time the four-power treaty was signed there was no indication or expressed desire on the part of the Netherlands, any more than there was on the part of Italy or on the part of other powers who were attending the conference, to be a party to the contract. Nothing was heard from their delegates on that subject.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did they know——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Nevada yielded to me to make this statement, and he must give me the time to answer his question.

Mr. PITTMAN. Go ahead. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I do not want to take the Senator's time, and I apologize for doing so; but I was invited in; I did not "butt" in.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Alabama was invited in to answer a plain question which he has not yet answered. I want him to take all the time he desires to answer which one of the powers he thinks might object to this amendment? The Senator may take his time to answer the question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not answer that. None of them might object. I have said that several times; I said that in my main address. I do not say that any of them are going to object; but I say they may object. The Senator will accomplish nothing by his amendment, and he may be doing a futile thing and injure the treaty. I have said all the time—I tried to say it the other day and on yesterday, and I say it again to-day—that, so far as I am concerned, I wish we could join the agreement creating the League of Nations under which all nations covenant to respect each other's rights, but we can not do so; and that question was not before the conference. We entered into this agreement to respect the rights of four nations. In principle, I raise no objection to the Senator's amendment; but I say it is futile; it will accomplish no result. I have no doubt that the same concessions would be given to any other nation that had the same status and wanted to come under the agreement that was granted to the Netherlands. I think, however, to adopt an amendment of the character proposed by the Senator from Nevada might possibly injure the prospect of the ratification of the treaty. I do not say it will injure it; I have never said that; and I can not name any country that will reject the treaty on that ground; but I say some country may do so; and as I think this four-power treaty is a treaty of peace in the Pacific, that it guarantees peace to this country in the future and protects our status in the Philippine Islands from the possibility of a war in the future, I am not willing to take any chances in voting for an amendment which I do not think would be effective or would accomplish any real good and which is not going to accomplish anything more than may be accomplished by the method used in connection with the Netherlands. Therefore, I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I wish to address another question to the Senator from Alabama, and I very much regret, indeed, that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who was here a moment ago, has been called from the Chamber, as usual when these matters grow critical. I wish he was here, because from circumstances to which the Senator from Alabama has heretofore adverted——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Montana that the Senator from Massachusetts was here a moment ago, and he came by my desk, and he said that he was not feeling well and would probably have to be out of the Chamber for the remainder of the day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From the circumstance heretofore adverted to by the Senator from Alabama, I dare say he is not able to give us any information on the matter concerning which I am desirous of getting some light. It is this: Can the Senator tell us whether this principle, which I have characterized as one of elemental justice, namely, that both parties to a controversy should be before the conference, was considered in the preparation of the treaty, and excluded designedly upon the protest of some or the objection of some member, or did the framers of the treaty forget all about it? Was it a case of casus omissus?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the Senator from Montana is doing me justice in this matter. It is rather embarrassing for me to say it, but I have given all the information I could. As I have stated two or three times on the floor, unfortunately at the time this treaty was being framed and the details were being worked out, I was called away on account of a death in my family, and I can not give the Senator the information.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had a great deal rather have asked the question of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So long as the Senator asks me for my opinion, I am glad to give all the information I can, but when it comes down to asking me about details in reference to a certain matter, the Senator knows why I was not present, and he can not expect me to answer the question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I have said to the Senator, by reason of the circumstances to which he has referred, it may be that he is unable to answer my question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sorry that I can not answer the Senator from Montana. I have not any information which would enable me to answer. I should be glad to answer the Senator if I could.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada permit me to ask the Senator from Alabama a question; one which I regard as very important yet which is not germane to the question now under discussion?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Utah for that purpose.

Mr. KING. May I premise the question by an observation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer the question of the Senator from Utah if I can, but I am not sure that I can.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that if there is any controversy likely to arise between the United States and Japan or France or Great Britain in the regions of the Pacific that controversy will relate to the mainland rather than to what might be denominated insular possessions. The little islands that are sprinkled throughout the Pacific Ocean are not of much consequence to us and not of much consequence to Japan or to Great Britain or to France. The real source of danger in the Pacific, as I view the situation, the prolific cause of danger, exists in China and Siberia, Manchuria and Mongolia. Why was the treaty so drawn as to exclude the prolific causes of controversy which might justly lead us to desire conferences between nations and to include matters unimportant and as to which there is not one chance in a million, if I may be permitted that expression, of any controversy ever arising?

We know that there is danger in China, in Manchuria, in Mongolia, and Siberia; we know that controversies may arise there at any moment; but we do not anticipate any trouble in Australia, in New Zealand, in the mandated islands north of the Equator, or the mandated islands south of the Equator, in Formosa, in the Pescadores, or in the southern half of Sakhalin. It seems to me that the conference avoided an attempt to bring into the forum of adjustment and conciliation those causes which may lead to controversy and may eventuate in war, and dealt with unimportant and insignificant matters, as if they were trying to camouflage the real interests and to throw dust in the eyes of the people in respect to the important quesions of controversy that might lead to war.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am surprised at the Senator's question, although it might be pertinent if the conditions were different. The Senator, of course, is right that the situation in reference to China is far more serious than it is in the islands of the region of the Pacific; undoubtedly he is right about that;

but the Senator overlooks entirely the fact that the four-power treaty is only one of the treaties that were made during the Conference on the Limitation of Armament, and that the questions in relation to China were adjusted and dealt with by the conference in other treaties and other resolutions.

As to whether the conference broadly and fairly covered the questions relating to China in the other treaties may be a question of controversy; I think they did in the main, so far as they could, so far as it was possible for them to handle the question, but there they were dealing with nine powers interested in China, and some of those nine powers had no interest in the islands of the Pacific. So it seems to me the Senator ignores entirely the work of the conference when he charges that they did not consider in connection with the four-power treaty the grave questions in China. When they made other treaties, upon which the Senate of the United States must pass upon after the pending treaty shall have been disposed of, there was no occasion whatever for embracing in the four-power treaty matters in relation to China.

Of course, as to Siberia we could not make—we had no power to make—a treaty concerning the mainland of Siberia when the Russian Government was not seated at the table.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not quite agree with the last statement the Senator has made. It seems to me that if the four powers were sitting down at a conference table for the purpose of elaborating a plan that might prevent war they would take into account not only their own territory but contiguous territory that might be the cause of international controversy and might lead us into war.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am afraid that my friend looks at this question and these issues very much as if he were disposing of a league of land or selling a ship. If the powers of Europe were to sit in Paris or in London and enter into a contract favorable or unfavorable as to what they intended to do with the United States of America or what their attitude in reference to the United States of America and its internal affairs should be without inviting us to the table, it would be a very serious offense to the people of this country; and, although I may recognize that the government of Russia to a large extent is down and out for the present, the Russian people are a proud people; they are a great nation; and I think it might have given very serious offense if we had undertaken to deal with the problem suggested by the Senator from Utah.

We did by declarations on the part of this Government—and that is as far as we could go in the conference—refer to our present and past relations to Russia, our desire to maintain her territorial integrity, and to prevent the invasion of her soil. We went as far as we could go, and we are not to be criticized justly, in my judgment, when we could not go any further because of conditions and facts over which we had no control.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator, I can not assent to the conclusion he reaches. It seems to me that we may be interested in avoiding a controversy respecting soil which we do not own and to which we do not intend to assert title.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly we may be interested, but we can not settle questions in reference to the soil of other nations without giving them a chance to sit at the table, without giving offense, in my judgment.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator most heartily, but the Senator, I think, agrees with me that the possibility of controversy in the Pacific does not relate so much to the insular possessions as described in this treaty as it does to the mainland; and I can not yet, notwithstanding the explanation made by the Senator, understand why the Washington conference in connection with this treaty, which provides a sort of instrumentality for the adjustment of controversies, namely, a conference with three other nations, did not extend its operations and its activities, so that if any controversy should arise that would threaten the peace of any of the four powers, not only with respect to the islands in the Pacific but with respect to any land or territory or problem of the Pacific, a conference might be held for the purpose of trying to adjust and settle the dispute and thus avoid war.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that the conference, recognizing the grave situation in China, endeavored to meet the issues involved in a separate treaty. I am not going to trespass on the time of the Senate in order to discuss the merits of the Chinese treaty, and I do not want to do so now; but I think it is a sufficient answer to the Senator's complaint that matters relating to China are not covered by the pending treaty to say that they are embraced in another treaty, and I believe the issues are met in the other treaty. The Senator may not agree with me, but when the Chinese treaty comes before the Senate I shall be very glad to discuss with the Senator the question of its merits and whether or not we met the situation in that treaty. It is sufficient, in answer to his suggestion that Chinese problems are not included in the four-power treaty, to say that they are disposed of, or attempted to be disposed of, in another treaty which is pending before the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just one observation, because I am trespassing on the time of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I, too, have been trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Nevada, and I apologize to him, but I could not help it.

Mr. KING. I repeat that this treaty attempts to dispose of matters that are wholly unimportant, as to which there is not a chance at all of controversy, and ignores questions as to which there is an opportunity for controversy and about which there will probably be controversy. The framers of the treaty have provided for conferences as to the mandated and other islands, although no one disputes the claims of any one of the possessors of those territories, but they do not provide any means for a conference with respect to other matters which possess the seeds and the germs of dispute and controversy. If this treaty had provided for conferences as to disputes in the mainland, it would have commended itself, it seems to me, more strongly to the American people than it does when it deals with insignificant and unimportant matters as to which there is no possibility of a controversy.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am going to take up a few of the statements of the Senator from Alabama before I resume the thread of my remarks where I was interrupted. The Senator seems to think that it would require a contract, a treaty with other powers before we could invite them into a conference. I do not think it is necessary to discuss that. The covenant of the League of Nations provided that the council might invite in a party to a controversy that threatened war that was not a member of the League of Nations. A contract, of course, is something binding. An invitation is something that may be accepted or not accepted. As a matter of fact, there is nothing binding in this conference, according to the Senator from Alabama. If there is nothing binding in this conference, why do you have to have a treaty to get an outside party in to discuss something?

Then they come right back and say it is perfectly natural that they should invite them in to discuss it. How do we know that Japan would consent to the inviting in of Russia or China for a discussion between those countries? There is only one way in which we can know it, and that is to provide it in this instrument.

The only objection that the Senator has urged against this amendment, as I understand, is that it may prevent the ratification of this treaty by England or Japan or France. That is all there is to it; and yet when the Senator from Montana asked the Senator from Alabama if there was any one of those countries that he had in mind that might object to this amendment he said he did not know.

This amendment is perfectly simple. It simply provides that in the event of a controversy between one of these four powers and China or Russia these four powers will try to stop that controversy before it becomes war. Is it possible that the Senator from Alabama can think that England would object to that being placed in this instrument or that France would object to it? I do not think so for a single moment. The only ground upon which he could expect any one of those countries to object to it would be on the ground that that country did not want the other side of the controversy known at the conference. That could be the only ground. The only other theory upon which this amendment could be objected to by England or France or Japan is that this treaty is not for the purpose of preventing controversies from developing into war but it is for the purpose of winning that war when it arises. If that is the purpose of this agreement, then it is an alliance, because undoubtedly one of the chief elements of an alliance is an agreement between powers to advance their own interests without regard to the interests or rights of others. Now we find out that the Netherlands wanted to become a party to this four-power treaty. The Senator says that I misrepresented his statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; I would not say that my friend misrepresented me. I make no such charge as that.

Mr. PITTMAN. That I misunderstood the Senator, then, and that my statement so expressed my understanding.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure. That is more kindly expressed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not sensitive on that point, because I know the friendship the Senator has for me and that he knows that the misrepresentation would not be intentional; but I do not yet see the difference between the way in which I presented it before and the way in which I now present it.

The four-power treaty was signed, and then the Netherlands expressed a desire to be a party to it. The Netherlands were not invited to be a party to it when it was being framed. None of the American delegation, as I understand, to the knowledge of the Senator from Alabama, ever thought about inviting the Netherlands to become a party to it. Nobody else invited them to become a party to it; and when they announced their desire to become a party to it it had already been signed. That is what the Senator said. What he meant by that I do not know. I simply said that that was the excuse offered why they were not members of it—that it was already signed.

As a matter of fact, how did the Netherlands know that a four-power treaty was being drafted? The Senator from Alabama did not know much about it, because practically all of it took place while he was on a visit to Alabama. The newspapers did not know anything about it. How would you expect the Netherlands to know anything about it until after it was signed? The fact remains that the drafters of this treaty did not want the Netherlands in it. You can not conceive that men as familiar with international law as the drafters of this treaty never for one moment considered the advisability of having the Netherlands a member of this treaty. Such a thought is absurd; and if they thought about it, it is inconceivable that they did not discuss it. Why was it, then, if they thought about it and they discussed it, that they did not want the Netherlands in this treaty? Was it because they did not want a full, frank conference and adjustment between all of the nations that have insular possessions in this region of the Pacific? If not, then why not have the Netherlands in this treaty?

I ask the Senator again if there is any provision whatever in this treaty providing for any peaceful means of settling a controversy with regard to the Pacific between one of these four powers and an outside power that might lead to war?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the whole treaty is for that purpose.

Mr. PITTMAN. What is the article of it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Article 2, I believe. I have not the treaty before me.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is right here. I should like to see the article.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, Mr. President, as I said a minute ago, the Netherlands are in the treaty now. This Government has written a note to the Netherlands, and so have all the other three Governments——

Mr. PITTMAN. Has the Senator a copy of the note?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It has been published. I can not put my hand on it at this moment. It was sent here with the original papers.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thought possibly the Senator had it on the desk before him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I have not it before me, but it was laid before the Senate officially.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; I know it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. By that note the Netherlands are given all the privileges under this agreement. It is extended to them by a note. Outside of the Netherlands and the powers that sign this contract, I do not recall that there is any power that has insular possessions or insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean, except Russia, holding the northern half of the island of Sakhalin. I may be mistaken about that, but I do not recall any such power, and if the Senator recalls any such power I shall be glad if he will call it to my attention.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think Portugal has such possessions, but we will pass that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not sure that Portugal's possessions are in the region of the Pacific. Are they not in the region of the Indian Ocean?

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, I do not know what "the region of the Pacific" is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is, in the Pacific Ocean, of course.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then Portugal has such possessions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think they have one island there.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let us say, for the sake of this argument, that they have not any.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator is right, that they have one island. Of course, they have larger possessions in the Indian Ocean. Of course, the purpose of this treaty was to secure the peace between these four contracting parties, not to secure the peace between some one else; but this treaty provides that if the rights in the Pacific are threatened they shall confer, and if they can confer they can confer in the interest of peace more readily than they can confer in the interest of war; and I assume that the parties to this contract would confer under those circumstances in the interest of peace and not in the interest of war.

Mr. PITTMAN. The question I asked the Senator was to show me any provision in this treaty providing for a conference by the four powers signatory to the treaty, or any of them, with an outside power with which it was having a controversy that might lead to war. The Senator referred me to article 2, and I will read that article.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I stated to the Senator, the treaty was not drawn for the purpose of having a conference with outside powers. It was drawn for the purpose of having a conference with the powers signatory to the treaty; and, as I have stated to the Senator, they could be invited in under that power, but there is nobody to invite in. We can not make an agreement with Russia at this time; that is impossible; and outside of Portugal's one island, with no request on the part of Portugal to come in, as the Netherlands requested, to my mind the contention of the Senator from Nevada about our inviting other powers in here when there are no other powers to come in and no other powers desiring to come in is a mere ignis fatuus to light the way against the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I repeat that I asked a certain question, and to keep from the wanderings of the Senator I shall have to come back to it again. I asked him if there was any provision in this treaty requiring the four powers, in the event of a controversy between the four powers or one of them with an outside power threatening war, to invite the outside power or powers into a conference. Before his last wanderings the Senator referred me to article 2, which I will now read as the answer to my question:

> If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

That is the only clause that the Senator from Alabama finds in the treaty which he says answers my question. It does not answer the question, but it answers it as well as any other article in the treaty. As a matter of fact, article 2 assumes that a war has already commenced against one of the four powers. It has nothing whatever to do with any effort to settle a controversy that might have resulted in the war referred to in article 2. The Senator was right in one statement, and that was that this treaty was not formed for the purpose of preventing war in the Pacific, but was formed simply for the purpose of preventing war between the four powers in the Pacific. That is true, and that is the chief object of an alliance. It is the chief definition of an alliance, and that is exactly the objection that has been made against this treaty all the way through. If this treaty had for its purpose the prevention of war in the Pacific, I do not believe there would be a single vote against it on this side of the Chamber.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] yesterday pleadingly sought an opportunity to be allowed to vote for this treaty. He wants to vote for it. He has voted for every peace treaty that ever has been brought before this body; and yet for the purpose of getting almost a unanimous vote in this body you will refuse to incorporate in the treaty a principle that you must approve, that you can not attack, upon the ground that perhaps some one of these other three nations has so low a regard for the principle that you like that it would not stand for it.

What reason is there for haste in this matter? Suppose that we did adopt this amendment to-day. How long would it take us to find out whether the other three powers would agree to it or not? It might take a week. What would happen in the Pacific Ocean in a week? Suppose it took a month to find out what the other three powers thought about this principle of peace. What would happen in that month's time? If there is any great danger hanging over this country that requires us to ratify this treaty instantly for fear of something, what is that great danger? If any Senator knows anything about it, it is his duty to the Senate and the country to state what that great danger is.

Suppose we adopt this amendment and the matter goes over to Great Britain, and Great Britain says: "We refuse to accept this amendment." All right; it is not accepted, and the treaty is sent back to this body. What has happened before it is sent back? Has any harm happened in the last month while it is gone? Have the Philippine Islands been taken? The whole thing about it is this: I am afraid that the Senator from Alabama knows the purpose of this treaty. I am afraid that the Senator from Alabama knows that the purpose of this treaty is not to prevent war in the region of the Pacific but is to insure the success of that war in favor of these contracting powers. If that is true, then, of course, they do not want the peaceful means substituted and would not accept the amendment.

I have asked the Senator where there is a provision in this treaty looking to the settlement of a dispute affecting these insular possessions between an outside power and one of these four powers, and all that he can do is to refer me to article 2. Article 2 expressly provides for a conference between the four powers to adopt means to oppose an aggression that has already commenced; and yet, as I said before, this proposition has been misrepresented to this country and has been misrepresented to the world. There is not a religious body in this country nor a great public body that has not been taught to believe that this is a treaty for peace. Do you think for one moment that you would ever hear called to the attention of the directors of a great church board the argument that I am now making? No. Who are the speakers that are now speaking in the churches on this subject? One of our Senators has been speaking in the churches of this city. He said this was a treaty for the purpose of preventing war.

Did he ever tell that great congregation of church people that this was a treaty simply to protect the interests of the four parties to it? Did he tell that great congregation of church people that this body refuses to recognize the principle that another nation outside of these four may have just rights in controversy? Oh, no. Did he tell them that this treaty does not recognize the adopted principle of this Government that disputes should be settled by conference and by arbitration and by peaceful adjustment? No; he never told them that. He led them to believe that this treaty does provide for it.

There are Members of this body who in reading the part of the treaty which refers to a conference between the four powers think that that conference is for the purpose of preventing war. They do not read it carefully enough to see that it is a conference for the purpose of meeting war; that it is a conference which has become necessary because they did not take steps to prevent the aggression before it started.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is always mentally honest, saw that point. He saw it when he said, "Your remedy is in the League of Nations." If the remedy is in the League of Nations, what is the use of this treaty at all? If this is not a substitute for the League of Nations, as far as the Pacific is concerned, what is the peaceful use of it at all? Of course, if it is an alliance in the Pacific, I see reason, as far as the four powers are concerned, for making it. If the League of Nations is the body which is to prevent war in the Pacific, if the council of the league is the body to which disputes arising in the Far East are to be referred to prevent war, then this instrument is unnecessary, as far as an attempt to prevent war is concerned. But if a dispute in regard to the Pacific takes place, if a dispute which threatens war is taken before the council of the League of Nations, we will have no influence in settling that dispute, because we will not be a member of the league; we will have nothing to do with it.

Mr. President, this argument has so far developed this fact that there is not a provision in this treaty for the settlement of controversies which may involve war in the Pacific, except controversies between the four powers. There is no provision in this treaty which gives any consideration to the cause of China or Russia or any outside power which may have a controversy with Japan, or with any of these four signatory powers. In my opinion, as the Senator from Alabama said, this treaty was never intended for any other purpose than to join together the four signatory powers and prevent them from fighting each other. There is nothing else in this treaty, Mr. President, except an agreement between these four powers to consult as to the most efficient means of meeting aggression against any one of them. It is an alliance, and the statement in the reservation offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], that it is not an alliance, is an absurdity on its face. You might just as well take a bulldog and place a sign across his breast reading, "This is not a bulldog; this is a lamb," as to say a thing like that. The very wording of the instrument which we signed makes absurd our declaration as to what it is. A declaration that this is that, or that it is not that, amounts to nothing when it stands in view of the people who see it. This instrument might be designated as an agreement for peace, the reservation might deny it was an alliance, if only the reservation were read, if only the reservation became public, if only the reservation were reduced to writing; but a declaration that something is not something which the world knows it to be amounts to nothing but an absurdity on its face.

There has been every attempt in this body to prevent consideration of the treaty. There has been every evasion in replying to questions asked in the argument. There has been a studied effort to attempt to deny questions directly. In fact, the member of the delegation who knows the least about this thing—if it is possible for anyone to know the least—is the only one who is left here to answer questions. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] runs every time anyone starts to ask him a question. He is constantly on the run.

I said a long time ago, before I was interrupted, that this propaganda which is being incited in this country, even by speeches of United States Senators in churches in this city and in speeches by Senators before great national clubs and civic bodies, is possibly having its effect upon some of the Senators in this body. Oh, it looks as though there is a great, unanimous feeling in this country that this treaty must be ratified immediately to prevent this country from being deluged in some great destruction which is not described. How long do Senators think that deception is going to last?

I remember away back before the treaty of peace was signed that we had a great league in this country to enforce peace. I remember that they sent its messages all over this country demanding that everybody support the League to Enforce Peace. When the treaty of Versailles came here I had on my desk, as every other Senator did, resolutions by the directors of these church associations, representing hundreds of thousands of people. We had resolutions from every patriotic body in this country, from every great civic association, urging us to ratify the Versailles treaty immediately. It looked as though the whole country were in favor of it, and yet, when it came to an issue before the American people, there is no doubt as to what they thought about it. They thought that it was an alliance, whether it was an alliance or not. I do not think it was. I did not think it was an agreement of one group of nations against all the others, as is undoubtedly contemplated in this instrument. I want to tell Senators one thing, that when the majority of 7,000,000 people who voted for the Republican Party find out what this instrument is, when they find out what the whole deal is, the condemnation which will come down upon the proponents of these treaties will be severe indeed compared to the punishment which was administered by the people to the supporters of the Versailles treaty.

Things can not be rushed through a body of this kind with as little information as surrounds this; men can not, by just crying that we will have war unless we do this, influence long the people of this country. They will have a little influence on them for a short time, but not for long.

This instrument is going to be condemned more than any instrument ever presented to this body. It is the result of the diplomatic cunning of the diplomats of the Old World and the Christian confidence of the delegates of the New World. It is the result of the deliberations of politicians who have long dealt in the framing of alliances with politicians who are simply afraid of a war scare.

They contend, through their propaganda throughout the country, that the United States Senate is interfering with the transaction of business by this Government. They charge that the United States Senate is bringing this Government into contempt by delaying the ratification of these treaties. Mr. President, what the world may think about this Government may affect our feelings, may even affect our commerce, but it does not weigh with our duty to protect this Government. There has been no talk in all of this debate of protecting this Government, except our protection from an attack on some of our foreign possessions by some foreign foe.

The United States Senate, according to some of the people of this country, has prevented hundreds of treaties from wrongfully binding this Government. When we enter into a contract with an individual, which is a private treaty, and there is a violation of the terms of the agreement, there are courts to enforce those terms; but when a nation violates its contract with another nation there is but one power to enforce it, and that is war. That is one reason why the organizers of this Government, that is one reason why the makers of the Constitution of the United States, required such solemn consideration and practices in the adoption of a contract with a foreign government.

Look back over the history of our treaties. What has been the result of those treaties? There has possibly been more trouble between nations by reason of the different construction of treaties than from nearly anything else. Take our treaty with regard to the Panama Canal. It would have been far better if the Senate of the United States had given more time to the consideration of that treaty. It was drawn by men just as able as those who drew this treaty, and yet the language was so indefinite, so ambiguous, that two of the greatest international lawyers in this country disagreed diametrically as to what it meant. The late Senator Knox held that the language of that treaty plainly meant that it did not apply to American ships, while the distinguished American lawyer who was a member of the conference which drew this treaty and participated in the drawing of this treaty, Elihu Root, held that it did include American ships.

Practically every treaty which has ever been drawn has been ambiguous. It seems to be the habit of the drafters of treaties to so draw them that they may be read favorably by all parties to the contract. Read them, and you will find that is true. When diplomats arrive at an understanding, then they call in the drafter of treaties, who draws the language so that it may be construed to mean what each side desires it to mean, without regard to what should have been meant. Thus they shift the burden to posterity.

We are entering into a treaty to bind this country for 10 years, and yet it is the will of those proposing this treaty that it be passed in 10 minutes. They are seeking to take this Government into an alliance affecting the whole Pacific Ocean, an alliance that is more fraught with the germs of war to-day than any other alliance in all the world, an alliance we can not get out of for 10 years; and yet they condemn the Senate of the United States because it is willing to take some time to analyze and consider this matter.

The proponents of this treaty are responsible for the delay so far, because they have not come to this body with the information which was essential to the proper action of this body, and because they have not answered directly the questions asked them touching the negotiation of this treaty. Whether that be by reason of the fact that they do not know, or because they are unwilling to tell, is absolutely immaterial. It is only to-day, after weeks of debate, that we find out from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the Netherlands were never asked to become a party to this treaty, and that the Netherlands tried to get into the treaty just as soon as they found out that there was such a thing as a four-power treaty.

When the Senator was asked as to why he objected to an amendment being placed in the treaty bringing in China, or bringing in Russia, when there was a dispute involving China or Russia, his answer was that it might kill the treaty, that France and England and Japan might not accept it. If the ratification of this treaty were so essential to the country that it had to be ratified in a week or we would be involved in a great war, there might be something in the argument of the Senator. If war were hanging over us in the Pacific, which might break even in the next month unless we signed this treaty, there might be something in the argument of the Senator. But we are not threatened with war. There is not a proponent of this treaty who would state that if we did not sign this treaty at all there would be any war inside of five years. There may be war later on. Why not accept some of these amendments, which can not be opposed in principle, and put them up to our cosigners of this treaty, and ask them whether they do not approve of them in principle? What would be the great harm if they turned them down? It would simply mean a reconsideration by this body. The whole matter would have been debated.

There is a grave chance that this treaty will be defeated, because there are Senators on this side whom the proponents of this treaty have felt they had in their hands who see the necessity of amendments to make this a treaty for peace and not alliance for war. There are four or five Senators on this side who have been so conscientiously anxious for the ratification of this treaty that they are willing to swallow almost anything, but I tell Senators on the other side that those Senators will not stand for an alliance which means war instead of peace. If the majority are going to proceed in an arbitrary manner, if they proceed to force this alliance down the throats of the Senate, if they arbitrarily refuse to accept any explanatory provision, if they are going to stick to the proposition that the Senator from Alabama has just stated, that this treaty is simply an agreement between the four parties to prevent war between the four parties and not to prevent war by any one of the four parties against any other power, then this treaty will be defeated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not rise to answer the argument that my friend from Nevada has just made, because I think his last statement is very clear, that the purpose of this treaty is to prevent war between the four powers to the treaty. It is not for the purpose of engaging in war against people who are outside of the treaty. Of course, anyone who is familiar with the facts in the regions of the Pacific and as to the navies of the world knows that there is no other power in the islands of the Pacific, where naval warfare is essential if warfare is to be made at all, that has the navy to withstand an attack by any one of the four powers.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is the question?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will state it, Mr. President. If this is a peace treaty, why is it that the Republican majority votes down every amendment which would really make it a peace treaty?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not answer for the Republican majority. The Senator from Georgia will have to address his remarks to the Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Alabama what are his reasons for opposing such amendments?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Georgia was then present, but at considerable length this morning I have already stated my position. I have stated that I did not think the amendments would be effective or would accomplish the result desired, and that they might bring about delay.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I heard what the Senator from Alabama calls an answer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sorry my answer was not satisfactory to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I did not think the Senator met the issue.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But, of course, I realize that when two men differ in debate it is very difficult for one to answer to the satisfaction of the other, at least, while the debate is on.

I hold in my hand a memorial from a great church; but before I present it—and I have been sitting here for the last hour, in addition to enjoying the pleasure it always gives me to hear my friend from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] discuss a question, to get an opportunity to present this memorial—I think I ought to try to make it clear in the RECORD that the treaty now pending before the Senate is an effort to maintain peace between the four great parties who have signed it. So far as they are concerned, there is no other nation in the world that has the power to disturb the peace against any one of them, because individually they possess the great navies of the world; and as to the nations which are entirely outside of this pact, none of the four powers is going to make war on Portugal in reference to Portugal's possessions, nor is Portugal going to make war on them, and it can not do so. The Netherlands are already embraced within the terms of the contract, and, as I said before, the only other nations that could possibly be involved in these questions in the Orient are China, whose affairs are dealt with in another treaty, and Russia, which at present has no government with which we can deal. So I do not know to whom my friend referred as discussing these matters in the churches; but I am glad to say that the Christian churches of America stand for peace. They stood for the League of Nations; they stand for this treaty. They are not fooled about it, because in their hearts they know, whether it is effective or is not effective, that it is an honest effort to maintain the peace of the world.

Mr. President, I was given a memorial this morning which is addressed to the Senate of the United States from the Church of the Brethren, which is sometimes known as the Dunker Church, by its peace committee, W. J. Swigart, chairman, of Huntingdon, Pa.; J. M. Henry, secretary, of Washington, D. C.; Jacob Funk, Pomona, Calif.; and I. W. Taylor, of Ephrata, Pa. I send the memorial to the Secretary's desk and ask that it may be read in my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

To the honorable gentlemen, the Members of the Senate of the United States.

GENTLEMEN: This presentation is made to you by the peace committee of the Church of the Brethren (Dunkers). This committee is authorized and appointed by our international conference composed of over 600 delegates from America, Europe, India, and China. We authoritatively bear to you the united sentiment of the entire membership of this church, thousands of whom are among your constituents in many of the States you represent. We hereby ask that you hear our plea and trust you will have respect to our prayer.

We have noted with very great interest the work of the council of nations that sat in the city of Washington considering plans for the reduction of the armaments of the world and the establishment of peaceful and friendly relations among the nations.

Naturally, we could not expect perfection in their work, because it is the product of finite men. There doubtless are features in their report that are objectionable, in degree, to our American ideals. But Americans can be generous—they are generous—and take forward ground in yielding personal provincial ideals to the accomplishing of the general good of mankind. "National consciousness may consistently yield to international conscience."

We have been profoundly gratified by the purpose, spirit, and work of the council and believe that if the findings—the pacts and treaties and conclusions—are ratified, and the proposals become operative within the nations of the earth, a most notable service to mankind in the history and working of human governments and the progress of civilization will have been accomplished.

As we understand it, the results and findings of the council are now in your hands awaiting the action of your honorable body. We appreciate in some measure the responsibility resting upon you and the complexities and the consequent perplexities that will arise in the consideration of the varied interests involved.

Trusting that it may not be deemed presumptuous on our part, we are respectfully but earnestly asking that these treaties may speedily and without change receive confirmation at your hands.

We think of the facts that—

The council was called by the President of the United States in response to a call that originated within the Senate, so that the very inception of this worthy movement was brought forth from your own honorable body.

The council, composed of delegates from the powers of the world, sat day after day for a period of three months within the Capital City of this country.

The President of the United States and our delegates set the pace and, for the most part, established the policy and initiated and announced the purposes and the ends to be accomplished.

The other nations, by their delegates, worked in gracious harmony and conceded more than was expected at the beginning, especially those nations that had conflicting interests at stake. The final report was unanimously adopted and duly signed.

The council was closed and the finest spirit of good will and bona fide fellowship were apparent. The foreign delegates returned to their home Governments enthusiastic in their admiration for America and the wise and patriotic leadership of the statesmen of our Republic. The entire world is still turned toward us, and all eyes are expectantly waiting and watching for our move.

If, now, the United States of America should hold itself aloof and refuse to appear as party to the pacts, or even to delay with prolonged debate, it will provoke in the minds of the powers and the world at large a suspicion of the sincerity of our American people and our republican government in our calls and claims for unselfish peace negotiations. It will give the impression abroad that we are divided and uncertain of our own minds and judgments, and are moved by partisan and factional feeling rather than by a generous patriotism, and indicate that there is opposition and clash between the Executive and legislative powers of our Government.

So far as our own America is concerned in this glorious experiment, this is now the final test. It rests within the body that conceived and fostered the scheme awaiting recognition and confirmation. Should this work stop or fail here, the high ideals resident in the scheme, as well as the lofty hopes of the world, would receive a severe shock, and the prospect of permanent world peace be seriously disturbed.

But we believe it will not fail; and in the interest of the successful completion of the great opportunity, in behalf of the church which we represent, and at the same time reflecting the mind and wish of the great mass of the people of the United States, we again express our prayer that the treaties may receive early and favorable action. And so shall we ever pray.

The peace committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The memorial will lie on the table. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to article 1.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk the note with regard to the Netherlands, which I will ask the Secretary to read. It is the note referred to by the Senator from Alabama as constituting the provision by which the Netherlands were let into this treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the note will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

(From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 16, page 2643.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, February 11, 1922.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to our conversation in relation to the note given to the Netherlands Government, I beg to say that the following is a copy of the note which was delivered to the minister for foreign affairs of the Netherlands on February 4, 1922:

"The United States of America have concluded on December 13, 1921, with the British Empire, France, and Japan, a treaty with a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean. They have agreed thereby as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to these possessions and dominions.

"The Netherlands not being signatory to the said treaty and the Netherlands possessions in the region of the Pacific Ocean therefore not being included in the agreement referred to, the Government of the United States of America, anxious to forestall any conclusion contrary to the spirit of the treaty, desires to declare that it is firmly resolved to respect the rights of the Netherlands in relation to their insular possessions in the region of the Pacific Ocean."

This is identical with notes delivered by the British, French, and Japanese ministers.

A similar note was delivered to the Portuguese Government.

Very sincerely, yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Alabama is mistaken when he says that the Netherlands have been guaranteed the same rights in a separate instrument that are guaranteed to the four powers signatory to this treaty. The only right guaranteed to the Netherlands under that note is that the United States will respect their rights in the Pacific. There is no provision in that note by which the Netherlands may be called into conference or shall have a right to go into conference with regard to any matters affecting their possessions in the Pacific Ocean. The Netherlands are guaranteed the right that every honest government guarantees to every other honest government, namely, that their rights shall be respected. The Netherlands received merely a simple little note; that is all they got. They wanted to be in this treaty, but instead of letting the Netherlands in the treaty there was written a sweet little note to the Netherlands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not interpret this matter as does my friend from Nevada. I think that the great thing in this four-power treaty is that the four nations have agreed to respect the rights of each other. Outside of that, all of the other provisions are ancillary. The Netherlands, when they requested to have recognition on the grounds stated, were given a note, not only by the United States but also by the other three powers to the treaty, setting forth that each one of them would respect the rights of the Netherlands in their territory in the region of the Pacific. That was entirely satisfactory to the Netherlands, if not satisfactory to my friend from Nevada. They are satisfied with it; they think it covers their territory; they think it means peace for them.

I had overlooked in the debate this morning that a similar note had been delivered to Portugal by the four powers. So there is no difference in reference to these other nations, so far as their rights in the Pacific are concerned. The only difficulty that they are having is in the United States Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator did not quite finish stating what he likes about this treaty. What he said he likes about this treaty is that the four powers agreed to respect each other's rights. Another thing that he likes about the treaty is that they shall not respect the rights of anybody else.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That does not necessarily follow at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. Poor little Netherlands got a sweet note, and so did Portugal, saying that the four powers would respect their rights, but they got no invitation to join in the conference which has been provided for by article 2. Any nation which sees fit may attack the rights of the Netherlands, and there will be no joint action by the four powers to protect the Netherlands. If any nation attacks any of the rights of the four powers, they will jointly or severally defend those rights. They will not defend the rights of the Netherlands; they will not defend the rights of the Portuguese; not at all. They will not try to stop any dispute whatever involving Portugal; they simply say, "so far as we are personally concerned, we are not going to trespass on your rights," and this country has agreed to that long ago in numerous treaties. The fact remains that it is evident that they did not want the Netherlands in this four-power treaty. It is just one of the little pieces of evidence that go to show that this is a premeditated alliance between those four powers for their selfish interests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. I ask consent, as in legislative session, that the action of the House on the second deficiency appropriation bill may be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 80, and concurring therein with an amendment, insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 26 and 27, and requesting a further conference with the Senate thereon.

Mr. WARREN. As there are but three matters in contention, I move that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 26 and 27.

Mr. ROBINSON. What are amendments numbered 26 and 27?

Mr. WARREN. They are two items for the General Accounting Office, to investigate accounts and claims growing out of the expansion of the work of the Veterans' Bureau, the payment of interest on the public debt, and the settlement and payment of transportation claims.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the difference between the House provisions and the Senate provisions?

Mr. WARREN. They are items which the Senate put in which the House had not put in, and it is claimed that they were not asked for at the time the House had the bill under consideration. The House believed they were not necessary, and, if necessary, that they could be taken care of in a later deficiency bill, since the larger one of the two items is requested for the coming year. To be more specific, about $110,000 was thought to be necessary before the 1st of July for extra help and something like $300,000 was considered to be necessary during the fiscal year 1923.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senate proposes to abandon its ground on those two amendments, and therefore the appropriations will go out?

Mr. WARREN. For the present, with the expectation that they would further investigate the matter and there would be time to take it up before the end of the session.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. This is on the deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; we have a disagreement, and on this matter we could not arrive at an agreement, and the House conferees took it back to the House. The House voted by a very large majority to sustain their conferees.

Mr. BORAH. Is this the bill in which there was carried an appropriation for the Legislative Reference Bureau?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. BORAH. What is the amount appropriated for it?

Mr. WARREN. The amount appropriated already is, as I recall it, twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars, and we added a matter of perhaps $6,000, which the House disagreed to.

Mr. BORAH. How does that appropriation compare with last year's appropriation? I have understood that it was cut down so that it was thought it would cripple the work.

Mr. WARREN. It is a matter of five, seven, or ten thousand dollars less than last year's appropriation.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a word——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from South Dakota, I think, understands the matter.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that practically they will have to suspend the work of the Legislative Reference Bureau because of the lack of this $6,500 which they asked for. The bibliographer there, and the man who is in charge of this Legislative Reference Bureau, who is the director of it, so informed me, and he pleaded very hard for the small appropriation.

Mr. BORAH. The result would be the practical suspension of that bureau?

Mr. STERLING. So I understand, for the time being.

Mr. McCORMICK. It means that Senators will be deprived of the services of the Legislative Reference Bureau after the 15th of April?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; it means that.

Mr. WARREN. That may be true; I am not disputing it. That bureau should do its business as every other office or department should, within the appropriations made for it. In allocating the money appropriated they have handled it in such a manner as to exhaust the funds, or, I take it, that they are nearly exhausted, before the end of the year. I can not tell whether the money available will enable them to run until the middle of April or when, but the Senate committee inserted the amendment, and the Senate agreed to it, and I am sorry we could not maintain it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me say to the Senator that the appropriation for the forthcoming fiscal year, in the sum of about $35,000, is about equal to the appropriation for the expiring fiscal year and the deficiency intended to be appropriated by the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator, I think, is right about that.

Mr. McCORMICK. This Congress voted so little for the service of that bureau that if they had spent month by month proportionately what we voted to them, they could not have served Senators. It is most astonishing to me that the Senate and the House deliberately cut down the appropriation for the Legislative Reference Bureau, which is one of the most important adjuncts of our labors.

Mr. WARREN. There is immense latitude always in violent criticism of the Senate and the House, together or separately, but I wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that we were compelled last year to take the amount finally agreed upon, and this year we undertook to make it good. We were not able to do it in conference. We were not willing to let this bill, which carries some ninety-odd million dollars for the payment of disabled soldiers whose pay day is to-day, to go longer and to fight longer on the matter of five or six thousand dollars on that particular issue.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have not any criticism to make of the Senator from Wyoming in the course which he has taken, because I assumed that he could not afford to let this bill die.

Mr. WARREN. It was not a matter we gave up easily, I assure the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. However, I do want to say at this time that I think it very unfortunate that the Legislative Reference Bureau is not to be taken care of, but I assume it is possible to do it a little later. Is not that the case?

Mr. WARREN. It is. There probably will be further deficiency appropriation bills.

Mr. FLETCHER. My information is that without the money which the Senate provided they will practically suspend their work and be unable to carry it on.

Mr. WARREN. I am unable to say what the daily expenditure for that bureau is. I suppose from day to day it varies. I do not know what amount they still have unexpended, but they have some.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it very unfortunate that the Senate amendment could not be retained. I find no fault with the Senate conferees, but it is very unfortunate that the amendment was not retained.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator the reason for the Legislative Reference Bureau exceeding the appropriation, when they knew that Congress had fixed a certain amount for the year?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that is a very pertinent question, and answering it on the lines of the rule and good procedure, they had no right to do it. On the other hand, during the war the morale of the legislation has run down to some extent and we have been compelled to submit to deficiencies of various kinds, which we are trying to cut down; but now with the hangover of the war, especially the hospitalization and schooling of ex-service men, which we can not calculate long beforehand, quite large amounts must be brought in to be provided for in these deficiency bills.

However, let me say that the bureau which is now under discussion is the creature of and subservient to the whole of the House and the Senate—to the various Representatives and Senators as they ask for help in preparing legislation. I am not one of those who wish to criticize those men, situated as they are, who are almost bound to keep up with the work they are called upon to perform in these various requests.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask a question for enlightenment as to future action? The amount which was put on in the Senate and disagreed to by the House is to be cut out of the bill. The amount which remains, I understand, will be practically of no benefit whatever. So what is the use of appropriating anything at all if we have so crippled the Legislative Bureau as to make it worthless?

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the amount which will be left if the Senator's motion to recede is agreed to?

Mr. WARREN. This is a deficiency. An appropriation has already been made in another bill, I think, of $35,000, which is a very liberal amount, for the coming year.

Mr. KING. As I understand, this is a deficiency?

Mr. WARREN. It is provided for in the legislative bill, which has already passed, providing for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. ROBINSON. When will this work cease if this item goes out and there is no further appropriation along this line?

Mr. WARREN. They will be able to draw on the funds already appropriated for next year on the 1st of July.

Mr. ROBINSON. When will the work actually stop—on the 15th of April?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] probably has advised himself about it. I could not tell that.

Mr. ROBINSON. So there will be a period between the 15th of April and the 1st of July when the Legislative Reference Bureau would cease to function?

Mr. WARREN. The question is whether it will cease to function altogether or whether they would suspend a part of the corps, the other part undertaking to carry on the business. If they wish to cooperate and to do as the Senator, I know, would advise, the best they can under the circumstances, they would not close their doors—they would go on—because they certainly will be provided for otherwise.

Mr. ROBINSON. How would they be provided for?

Mr. WARREN. As I have said to the Senator, I expect we shall have undoubtedly another deficiency bill before the end of the fiscal year, and I hope at that time we will not be tied up, as we are in this bill, with a great amount of money due and payable as soon as the bill is passed, which rather forces us to spend less time in struggling with the conferees than we might spend under different circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should have imagined that since the adoption of the Budget system this difficulty would be practically an impossibility.

Mr. WARREN. The Budget is not to blame. The Budget Bureau estimated for this amount the same way as with other Senate items.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senate embraced the amount which the Budget Bureau recommended?

Mr. WARREN. The Senate did not exceed it. I want to recall one remark I made. There is one line of action under the bureau, what may be accounted for by our office here, and included in it the Library of Congress, and hence, instead of having a large line of bureaus, we excepted this one—the Capitol—in the Budget law, and we are not called upon to report to the Budget Bureau, but I think there was submitted the pay roll of the Senate and the pay roll of the House and the pay roll of the Library, and so forth.

Mr. ROBINSON. How does the deficiency arise? I think the Senator stated it, but I did not understand the statement.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator knows, of course, because he was a very able member of the Committee on Appropriations for a long time, that in these appropriations for 12 months the instructions should go out, and usually do, to the departments, that they allocate the sums for the various months so as not to exceed the amount appropriated. In this case I do not know whether they allocated or not, or whether it would be possible to do it, because Congress may or may not be in a long session, and I assume that on the calls of Senators and Members of the House for help in drafting bills, they have expended so much money that they feel that it is necessary to have this extra amount. Whether they have worked to their best advantage, and as many hours as a Senator does, or whether they have applied the eight-hour rule, and lived by it, I can not say.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am not sure but what if the Senate had union rules work would be more efficient. I am thinking a little bit about joining the union.

Mr. WARREN. I think there would be more work and less gas if that were the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Legislative Reference Bureau has performed a valuable service.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I regret that it is to be crippled for lack of necessary funds. The opportunity has not been afforded me to know whether its funds have been judiciously administered or expended, but I take it that the Senator from Wyoming and his associates of the Senate committee believed that this additional sum was necessary and desirable. I regret very much that the work of this bureau should be discontinued. If it is not discontinued, it is perfectly apparent that it can not function with efficiency during the remainder of this fiscal year. It will be so hampered from want of funds that its activities will be very greatly circumscribed.

Manifestly, if such a service is to be provided for, it ought to be made adequate; it ought to have sufficient funds to enable the bureau to act promptly and to procure the information which Senators and Representatives desire as speedily as may be possible. If the funds are so limited and the force restricted accordingly that the Reference Bureau can not promptly furnish information, it might just as well be abolished. I very much regret that it was not found practicable to retain this item in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. That, however, is not just now the issue. The issue now is a motion that we recede on the two amendments which I have stated as to the General Accounting Department.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am not opposed to the motion, and I am not going to stand in the way of the action which the chairman desires to have taken on the bill. However, I do feel like calling attention to one other item, because

I am afraid, while the chairman is fully advised about it, that the other conferees, particularly in the other body, did not thoroughly understand the situation.

Last fall Florida suffered from the effects of a very considerable West Indian hurricane which blew up out of the Gulf and swept along the southwestern coast of the State. It blew away a great many of the marks and aids to navigation along the Gulf, up the coast, the Manatee River, and Hillsboro Bay, and that region of the State. The people navigating ships there now have very great difficulty in getting along without these lights and other aids to navigation.

When the bill came over to the Senate, the Department of Commerce reported that situation to the chairman of the committee in a very strong way and recommended that the appropriation for the Lighthouse Bureau be increased $60,000. The chairman very properly and considerately offered an amendment to that effect and the amendment was agreed to in the Senate. It has been yielded in conference, and the result will be that the people in that region, navigating those waters will have to get along as best they can without these aids to navigation, because the Bureau of Navigation states they have not the money with which to supply them. They have been blown away by a hurricane, a very disastrous storm, and it leaves them without any means of replacing them.

I hope that condition will not have to continue very much longer and that a way may be found whereby at least some remedy may be provided for that condition. I regret very much that the conferees on the part of the Senate found it necessary to yield on that amendment, but I would not oppose the action which the chairman asks on the bill. I merely wanted to call attention to the facts, because there was no discussion about it in the Senate, and I am a little afraid the conferees did not understand the situation.

Mr. WARREN. I think that is true as to the conferees on the part of the House, because it seems that either the magnitude of the damage had not been understood or the proper witnesses were not called. The feeling on the House side was that they had included in the $60,000 sufficient until the matter could be taken up further, and they so insisted in conference. It is true that the head of the department later wrote to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate explaining the situation, and the Senate included the item. It went to conference and we struggled to maintain it, but it was one of the nearly 100 differences we had which we were compelled to surrender.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming one question, in view of the statement he made a moment ago that there would be another deficiency bill shortly.

Mr. WARREN. I am assuming that there will be. I have no authority to say that there will be one.

Mr. KING. Is it apparent, from the Senator's knowledge of the fiscal affairs of the Government and the expenses, that there will be deficits in the various departments before the expiration of the present fiscal year?

Mr. WARREN. Most likely.

Mr. KING. How many deficiency bills have already been reported?

Mr. WARREN. This is the second one.

Mr. KING. Then before the end of the year it is quite likely that the deficiencies will aggregate $300,000,000 or $400,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. I will not say that. If unfortunately we may have to run quite far into the summer, there would be a line of judgments and certified accounts, which are always taken up in the last days of the session, which must be provided for through a deficiency appropriation bill; also other matters.

In the first place, let me say that ninety-odd million dollars of the $120,000,000 is for the veterans. Then there is an appropriation of $27,000,000 to refund the taxes which have been erroneously collected from the people. Then there are many judgments, which I shall not undertake to enumerate. There are also other amounts which we have to pay. It is not a matter of pleasure, but a matter of necessity.

Mr. KING. Then, with the Budget system and with the appropriations made in accordance with it, we have not been able to determine what the appropriations should be, but have been compelled to pass two deficiency appropriation bills and may be compelled to pass two or three more? The Senator from Wyoming nods his head, which, I presume, indicates assent.

Mr. WARREN. I do not know whether the appropriations will be small or large, but the usual method is at the end of the session to sweep up and clean up these matters in a small deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I gather from what I have heard of what has been said during the last few minutes that the motion of the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, if agreed to, would eliminate from the bill the deficiency appropriation for the continuous maintenance of the Legislative Reference Bureau in the Congressional Library. Is that correct?

Mr. WARREN. The simple truth is that the regular bill failed to carry a matter of six thousand or seven thousand dollars—I do not remember the exact sum, although if it were at all in issue I could state it—of the appropriation for the Legislative Reference Bureau. Whether they close for the time being is a matter for them to determine; but there is no necessity of their entirely discontinuing, although they may have to dispose of some of their clerical force.

Mr. MYERS. According to the Senator's motion, the Senate would recede from the Senate amendment increasing the item for that bureau?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator misunderstands the motion. That matter has been disposed of and is beyond question. I am asking that the Senate recede from two other entirely different amendments which relate to the Accounting Department in the office of the Comptroller General.

Mr. MYERS. The matter as to which I have made the inquiry, then, is not involved in the Senator's motion?

Mr. WARREN. No; it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. MYERS. I am glad to be enlightened on that point. I should very much regret if there should not be a sufficient appropriation made for the continued operation of the Legislative Reference Bureau. I believe that is a valuable bureau, and if we are to have the benefit of it at all, it seems that it should be in operation all the time. It appears to me that it would be folly for it to operate only during a part of the year and then to suspend for a few months by reason of a lack of funds. I have felt that it was in danger of having to do that unless it could obtain a larger appropriation than Congress has granted. The Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the committee, now informs me that that question is not involved in the motion which is pending. I hope, however, that a sufficient appropriation has been made, or may be made, for the maintenance of the Legislative Reference Bureau, so that it may continue in operation without any suspension at any time during the year.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I will say that I quite agree with the Senator from Montana. I think it is very unfortunate that the appropriation for the Legislative Reference Bureau should be reduced.

I also suggest to the chairman of the committee that the appropriation to replace mariners' lights which have been swept away by storms is a matter of very great importance. It is very true that the omission of this item may result from a misunderstanding, but I think it is very unfortunate to have the lives of mariners and people who are sailing the seas imperiled and perhaps lost as the result of such a misunderstanding. It seems to me that it is imperative to have legislation providing for such an appropriation at once. The imperative need will be quite obvious to anyone who has been accustomed to sailing the seas. I hope that the committee has in mind legislation to take care immediately of that need.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the question is put I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming how much does the pending appropriation bill carry?

Mr. WARREN. Speaking roughly, I should say it carries an appropriation of one hundred and twenty-odd million dollars. I am speaking without having all the items before me. I have, however, several appropriation bills in mind just now, so I may be a little incorrect.

Mr. HARRISON. When the bill passed the Senate it provided an appropriation of $137,000,000 and something over. Those were about the figures, but I presume since then the amount carried has been somewhat reduced. This is the third deficiency bill, is it not?

Mr. WARREN. In its present form the bill carries a little less than when it passed the Senate; but it is the second deficiency appropriation bill, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says this is the second deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is not now counting the urgent deficiency bill, is he?

Mr. WARREN. The urgent deficiency appropriation bill was No. 1 and this is No. 2.

Mr. HARRISON. Can the Senator give us roughly the amount which is carried in the deficiency appropriation bills up to date, including this one, during the present session of Congress?

Mr. WARREN. The appropriations carried by the deficiency bills amount to something over $200,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Would they not amount to nearer $300,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. HARRISON. The urgent deficiency appropriation bill, as I understand, carried $50,550,000; the first deficiency appropriation bill carried $105,277,000; and this bill as it passed the Senate carried $137,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Mississippi confuses the two sessions of Congress, perhaps, for we have only had two such bills in this session of Congress, which commenced in December last.

Mr. HARRISON. I am including the first one, which was for $50,000,000, and which was passed at the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress. Is that correct?

Mr. WARREN. But this is the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. What other deficiency bill, may I ask the Senator, was passed in the last session of Congress?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is asking me, without my having the books before me, to cover a period running some time back, but I think there were, perhaps, as many as two and possibly three such bills passed during the last session.

Mr. HARRISON. And the appropriations contained in those bills amounted to about $382,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. I have not the figures before me.

Mr. HARRISON. Those are the figures contained in the book.

Mr. WARREN. They are correct, if they are in the book.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought so. So, during the last session of the Sixty-seventh Congress we appropriated in deficiencies $382,000,000, and up to date the deficiency appropriations during the present session of Congress, which is a little over three months old, total around $250,000,000. That is approximately correct?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Mississippi is working along the line of comparisons, I might call his attention to the fact that the deficiency appropriations during the present session are Lilliputian compared with the deficiencies which we passed a few years ago.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator misunderstands what I am driving at. I merely wanted to get the facts into the RECORD as to the amount of the deficiencies.

Mr. WARREN. I think I understand what the Senator is driving at.

Mr. HARRISON. I had hoped, as had other Senators, that after we had adopted the Budget system and had fixed our pattern that we would work toward it and that we would not have so many deficiencies.

Mr. WARREN. That is what we are doing.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I recall that during the World War——

Mr. WARREN. We now have fewer deficiency bills and they appropriate far less amounts.

Mr. HARRISON. I recall that during the World War necessarily we had to appropriate great amounts of money in the way of deficiencies. One bill, as I recall, carried several billion dollars; but before the war no deficiency bill ever carried more than $50,000,000, and I do not think we ever passed at any time more than two during any session; certainly at no session until our entrance in the war did Congress ever appropriate more than $75,000,000 in deficiencies.

Mr. WARREN. But the Senator understands——

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will permit me to continue, I desire to say that after we had adopted the Budget system we thought we would eliminate the necessity of appropriating money in deficiency bills; but we find that within three months we have appropriated practically two hundred and fifty-odd million dollars in deficiencies. So the Budget system is working splendidly up to date.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say——

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Idaho will excuse me for a moment, let me say the Budget system is working splendidly, and the Senator will have to admit it after it shall have had a fair trial. The Senator remembers that we are not yet out of the war; we are in the war to-day, and we shall be for a long time, so far as expenses are concerned. In fact, the very bill which is now before the Senate is almost entirely made necessary on that account, and so have been all of the other deficiency appropriation measures.

Almost a half billion dollars has had to be appropriated for the veterans of the war alone; and as the demands from that quarter increase from time to time they must be provided for in deficiency bills. That is a part of the war expenses proper. Nearly all of the judgments for which provision is made in the bill grow out of the hurry and scurry of war, when we were compelled to take property without proper compensation, to overturn patents, and to take wherever we liked; also to erect buildings on a cost-plus basis, as we did in a great number of instances. We have to clean all that up afterwards.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay a vote upon this matter; but, inasmuch as the Budget system has been mentioned, I desire to say that the idea has gone abroad throughout the country that by reason of the adoption of the Budget system some of the responsibility for appropriations has been lifted from Congress. The fact of the matter is that the Budget system will be an utter and absolute failure if Congress does not do its duty in cutting down expenses and appropriations. So long as the Congress creates bureaus and provides that method of expending money, the Budget Bureau can not do other than make an estimate for the bureau which we have created. The responsibility is still upon Congress——

Mr. WARREN. Exactly.

Mr. BORAH. And it can not be transferred to any other body so long as the Constitution of the United States remains as it is.

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. The Congress of the United States will have to assume the responsibility to the people of the United States for all appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming will permit me, I should like to add that the Budget system has been in operation only a little over six months, the law having been signed, as I recall, in June of last year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 26 and 27.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that leaves one matter still open, namely, amendment of the Senate numbered 60, to which the House has added an amendment. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to Senate amendment numbered 60.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, that disposes of this particular bill?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; it disposes of the bill.

FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. RANSDELL obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator yield for a moment, in order that I may present a reservation, which I ask may be read, and then that it may be printed and lie on the table?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I offer the proposed reservation because it represents the concentrated wisdom of the majority of the Republican members of the Foreign Relations Committee, or, rather, it did represent that concentrated wisdom at one time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator please state when that was?

Mr. JOHNSON. When the Foreign Relations Committee was acting upon reservations to the pending treaty the proposed reservation represented the concentrated wisdom, I assert, of the majority Republican members of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask if it represented then the wisdom of the majority members of the committee, why was it changed?

Mr. JOHNSON. Because some of the Republican members changed their minds the following day.

Mr. HARRISON. In the committee?

Mr. JOHNSON. In and out of the committee. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reservation intended to be proposed by the Senator from California will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from California proposes the following reservation to be made a part of and to be incorporated in the resolution of ratification:

The United States understands that it assumes no obligation, either legal or moral, to maintain the rights in relation to the insular possessions or insular dominions of any of the other high contracting parties, and that the consent of the Congress of the United States shall be necessary to any adjustment or understanding under articles 1 or 2 by which the United States is to be bound in any way, and that there is no obligation, either legal or moral, to give such consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reservation will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me for a moment in order that I may present a reservation?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SHIELDS. I present a reservation which I ask may be read, printed, and lie on the table. It is one, I think, that will not provoke any argument, but will be accepted in view of the explanations made here in the Chamber by the two American delegates who are Members of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reservation proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Tennessee proposes a reservation, to be incorporated in the resolution of ratification, as follows:

Provided further, That the United States gives its consent to the foregoing treaty and becomes a member thereof for the sole purpose of aiding, by its friendly offices and efforts, in removing friction and controversy between the several high contracting parties concerning their insular dominions and possessions in the Pacific Ocean in the regions described and without purpose to depart from the traditional American foreign policy which forbids participation by the United States in the settlement of political questions and contentions of foreign nations and Governments.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is there now pending any amendment to the treaty?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Louisiana will yield to me for that purpose I will submit an amendment, and ask that it may be read, so that it may be the pending question.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of article 1 it is proposed to add the following:

Each of the high contracting parties will refrain from entering into or being a party to any secret treaty, agreement, or understanding with any other power or powers during the life of this treaty.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, it gives me much pleasure to support the pending four-power treaty, and to express the earnest hope that it will be ratified without much further delay and by a large majority. This treaty is indissolubly connected with the treaty limiting naval armaments and with that relating to the principles and policies to be followed in matters concerning China. In my judgment these three treaties must stand or fall together. The reasons which induced the negotiation of one contributed strongly to the other two and vice versa. They were created by the same conference, at practically the same time, by the delegates who were assembled to consider the identical questions relating to reduction in navies and to peace in the Pacific and Far East that are included in these three treaties. I can not differentiate between them in such manner as to support one or two and oppose the third, hence I shall vote for all three.

So far as I can ascertain, there is practically no opposition in the Senate to the treaty which binds the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Portugal to respect the sovereignty and independence of China, and very little objection to the agreement of the United States, the British Empire, France, Japan, and Italy to reduce materially the capital ships in their respective navies. But there is much difference of opinion as to the four-power treaty, and it should be considered with the greatest care.

This latter treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan is couched in brief, simple language, which seems easy to comprehend. Article 1 binds the four contracting parties as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their "insular possessions and insular dominions" in the region of the Pacific Ocean. In case of controversy between themselves arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights, not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they agree to have a joint conference of the four contracting powers for consideration and adjustment.

Article 2 provides that if their aforesaid rights are threatened by aggressive action of any other power, the four signatories shall communicate with one another in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken to meet the exigencies of the situation.

Article 3 fixes the terms of the treaty at 10 years.

Article 4—the last—provides for ratification of the treaty according to constitutional methods of the high contracting parties. It also states that when this treaty is duly ratified the Anglo-Japanese Alliance of July 3, 1911, shall terminate.

An explanatory declaration attached to and made a part of the treaty recites that the controversies between themselves referred to in article 1 shall not be taken to embrace questions lying exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

And a supplementary treaty on the same subject was agreed to, which defines the meaning of the term "insular possessions and insular dominions" in its application to Japan.

When the treaty was submitted to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations a reservation, offered by Senator BRANDEGEE, was accepted by that committee and is now before the Senate, which reads as follows:

The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble, or under the terms of this treaty, there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

This reservation is intended to prevent any misconception in the minds of anyone, either in this country or abroad, as to the real meaning of the treaty. It neither adds to nor takes from the treaty, as I construe it, but it can do no harm and may do good, hence I shall vote for it.

This is the treaty. Let us analyze it and try to ascertain its true meaning. This can best be done by first stating the principal reasons which led to its adoption, as follows:

(a) There has been a great deal of friction for many years among all the leading powers in regard to China, especially since Japan took possession of Shantung in 1915, and has treated it practically as a conquered province.

(b) The failure of Japan to withdraw her military forces from Siberia after the United States Army retired from that country in the spring of 1920 has added fuel to the flames.

(c) China and Russia have been strong friends of the United States for the last century, and whatever affects either or both of them adversely arouses deep interest in America.

(d) On the Pacific coast of the United States a number of domestic problems connected with Japanese immigration and land ownership have caused much crimination and recrimination.

(e) The United States has vast responsibilities in the Far East through its ownership of the Philippines, which are 7,000 miles away from the mainland of America.

(f) There has been in existence for 20 years a treaty of alliance and defense between the British Empire and Japan which binds Great Britain to conduct war in common with Japan in order to defend its territorial rights or special interests.

(g) Japan is in close proximity to the Philippines; there is a very large Japanese population in the Hawaiian Islands; Japan has exhibited a remarkably militaristic spirit in her recent wars with China and Russia, her forcible absorption of Korea, and her continued hold on Shantung and Siberia.

(h) The three leading naval powers have been engaged in a race of giant battleship construction, the United States setting the pace, Japan following as fast as she could, and Great Britain, mistress of the sea for more than a century, panting in her effort to keep up a navy equal to ours.

Owing to these matters and a variety of others there was a deep feeling of anxiety throughout the world in regard to the Pacific and the Far East prior to the opening of the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments.

Such was the situation and such the temper of the world on the 12th day of last November, when the delegates of nine great countries assembled in Memorial Continental Hall in this city on our invitation. President Harding opened the conference with a strong plea for service to mankind in the spirit of simplicity, honor, and honesty. Then came the address of Secretary Hughes, in which he detailed the plans prepared by himself and his colleagues for a practical, substantial limitation of capital ships and a naval holiday of 10 years.

As Mr. Hughes elaborated his concrete program for reducing the navies of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan by scrapping a large number of big battleships, aggregating 1,878,043 tons, and fixing the tonnage of capital ships at 525,000 tons each for the United States and the British Empire and 315,000 for Japan, his auditors heaved a sigh of relief and broke forth in spontaneous, long-continued applause.

The American spokesman had laid all his cards face up on the table and written a new chapter in international diplomacy. Humanity breathed easier from that hour. It was a great triumph for the representatives of our country. I have never felt prouder of being an American citizen than on that occasion. The work of the conference was conducted as it began, in a spirit of honesty, fairness, and absolute frankness and openness. For three months the delegates labored faithfully and well. As a result they have presented to us five treaties, the three most important of which I have briefly outlined above.

In addition, and as a direct result of this conference, China and Japan have entered into a satisfactory treaty by which Shantung is restored to China, and that great source of trouble has been removed. As a further result of the conference Japan has made definite promises to withdraw her military forces from Siberia as soon as a satisfactory adjustment of her claims have been arranged with an orderly Russian government.

The origin and source of this conference was the necessity for maintaining peace in the Orient, and peace will be maintained if all the treaties negotiated by it are ratified.

To approve the naval disarmament plan and refuse to ratify the four-power treaty would, in my judgment, be a fatal mistake. Indeed, I very much fear that if the defensive alliance between Japan and Great Britain, which is to terminate upon the ratification of the four-power treaty, be allowed to continue in existence, owing to failure of ratification of this treaty, there will be such dissatisfaction in America, Great Britan, and Japan that the fate of the naval disarmament treaty will be greatly jeopardized, if it be not thereby defeated.

If the United States is to reduce the number of its battleships—and every lover of his country should wish to see that done, provided it can be accomplished safely—then Great Britain and Japan must terminate the alliance between them, the continuance of which would seriously threaten our country.

Many who are willing, aye, who are anxious, to reduce the number of our colossal battleships proportionately to a like reduction in the ships of Great Britain and Japan would be unwilling to see our Navy seriously crippled while an alliance continues between Japan and Great Britain providing specifically for the union of the fighting forces of these two great nations in case of trouble with any other country.

If the four-power treaty be ratified, and not alone Great Britain, Japan, and the United States but also France be joined in a friendly understanding to keep the peace of the Pacific and the Far East, at least in so far as their insular possessions and insular dominions are concerned, and at the same time the alliance between Great Britain and Japan is terminated, there is no reason why the limitation of naval armaments should not be carried out with very great benefit to all the world, and with no loss to any nation of its relative strength on the sea.

The four-power treaty is merely an agreement between the four countries which are most powerful in the Pacific to meet in friendly conference with a view to ascertaining all the facts and doing everything possible to adjust any differences between themselves that may arise in regard to their insular possessions or insular dominions in the Pacific. It is not an alliance. It does not bind any of the nations to engage in war for the benefit of the other nor to refrain from going to war with one or the other if an adjustment of their differences is found impossible after full conference and earnest efforts at settlement.

Article 1 is substance creates a court of conciliation, composed of the two other powers, who shall give their good offices whenever trouble arises between two of their associate powers. Representatives of the four countries assemble, and there is a full, frank discussion of the points in dispute; there is an actual finding of the facts in the case and a hearing of all the arguments pro and con. The two disinterested powers can then express their views so clearly and simply as to result, in most cases, in their being accepted. The experience of mankind has proven that most trouble between individuals—and the same is true of nations—arise from misconception, from ignorance of the other party's viewpoint, and whenever individuals or nations can be induced to thresh out their differences in detail, with the assistance of disinterested friends, there is generally a satisfactory adjustment, or, at least, there is no resort to hostilities.

It must not be overlooked that this conference of the four powers, assembled to consider a difference arising between two of them, will, in all probability, be conducted publicly, just as the proceedings of our recent conference were carried on, and if that plan be followed the public opinion of the world will assist in arriving at a proper settlement. I regard this as a most important feature, for there is nothing so strong on earth as well-informed public opinion, and there is no reason why we should not have the most intelligent public opinion on a matter of international import when the conferees of these four great powers get together, determined, in the spirit of the four-power treaty, to adjust any and all differences if possible.

As to article 2, providing for the adjustment of differences between one of the high contracting powers and any other power, the same general principles would apply. To illustrate, let us suppose that Russia and Japan should fall out in regard to Sakhalin and their differences should cause grave fear of a resort to arms. It would then be necessary for the United States, Great Britain, and France to join in a conference with Japan with a view to a settlement of these difficulties. In order to do justice these three powers would be obliged to hear as fully and freely as possible both sides of the case; hence Russia, as well as Japan, would be permitted to present its witnesses and arguments. In fact, these three powers would sit substantially as a court of arbitration, neither of them having any personal interest in the controversy and all anxious to maintain peace between Russia and Japan. In such a case it is inconceivable that the United States and France, which for a century have been close friends of Russia, would consent to any adjustment that did not render substantial justice to Russia. In fact, Russia in that event would have two of its best friends sitting in the conference called to adjust its differences with Japan, and it certainly could not complain of such a tribunal.

The same is true as to China in case it should have trouble with Japan and a conference between the four powers be convened, as provided by article 2. China has been and, I believe, always will be a close friend of the United States. There is also warm friendship between France and China. These three countries have demonstrated their affection for each other in many ways. Surely there would be no danger of an adverse decision to China in such a conference if the United States and France could avoid it.

I do not mean to intimate that these great powers would be too friendly to China or Russia and unfriendly to Japan. Such an idea is far from my mind, but I do contend that the tribunal, or conference, or whatever it is called, provided for in article 2, furnishes a fair-minded, just medium, which will come as near to a satisfactory settlement of international difficulties as any method that can be devised.

All will agree that the recent Conference on the Limitation of Armament has already been distinctly helpful toward world peace. It has removed many of the suspicions and anxieties that harassed the citizens of China, Great Britain, Japan, and our own country, to say nothing of other nations which are more or less interested in Pacific problems. Why can we not expect similar good results from a conference of the delegates of the four great countries who are parties to this treaty whenever they meet for the purpose of discussing international questions? Our only safe criterion for the future is the past. Conferences of the past have usually resulted in good. Why may we not expect good from those of the future?

I was a strong advocate of the League of Nations and deeply regretted the failure of the United States to join therein. That is a matter of past history, however, and we must deal now with the living present. The four-power treaty, in so far as the four leading nations of the world are concerned, very closely resembles the Versailles treaty except that it contans no threat of force nor anything bordering on force unless it be the force of public opinion. It was the alleged presence of this element of force in the Versailles treaty which was largely responsible for its defeat. I would gladly support a 12-power treaty, composed of the 12 leading nations of earth, or a greater number, applying to all questions of international controversy between themselves and others the same principles and policies which the four-power treaty applies to controversies arising out of the insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific of the four signatories. But such a treaty is not before us, nor is there the least likelihood of such a one being negotiated. I can imagine treaties much more far-reaching, comprehensive, and beneficial than the four-power treaty, but as a practical legislator I feel impelled to deal with what is before me and not with what I would like to have. Therefore, believing that this treaty contains much good and no evil, I shall gladly vote for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I was accused yesterday of having unnecessarily and unprovokedly dragged the Irish-American citizenship of America into this discussion. The charge, if it be a charge, the insinuation, if it be an insinuation, is false. Nobody has a right, as a so-called hyphenated American, to erect himself into a power within America and to attack the motives and the courage and the patriotism of everybody who differs with him without expecting some return in kind.

I did not bring these people into this controversy; they brought themselves into it. I have been receiving, as all Senators have been receiving, an almost daily "news-letter" from the "Friends of Irish Freedom," from the National Bureau of Information in the city of Washington. I have been reading these communications, in which they attack me and every other man who is supporting these treaties as being disloyal to America and a sort of hired agent of Great Britain, until I got tired of it.

I have no respect for a man who makes an attack upon another and then, when his attack is replied to, pleads the baby act and says, "You are hitting me." I never hit anybody unless that body has previously attempted to strike me.

I hold in my hand one of the many vilifying utterances of this association. It is dated March 11. Amongst the other things it says are these:

Those who favored "entangling alliances" and said that if the various treaties were to be ratified by the Senate speedy action was necessary, spoke by the card. Every hour adds to the chances of defeating the un-American alliance.

The "un-American alliance"! Mr. President, one of my ancestors lay in a British prison ship six months before he could be exchanged. Another of the family is buried at Kings Mountain, and buried where he died, and these fellows are coming up telling me about something that is "un-American"! They go on:

The return of Secretary Hughes is awaited with undisguised interest by the American delegates, LODGE and UNDERWOOD, who have themselves admitted that they knew nothing of the secret negotiations leading up to the four-power pact.

Of course, they confess they knew nothing about "the secret negotiations," if there were any, because if there were any they were secret. I happen to know a little something about the ancestry of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], a good old Kentucky family, going away back to the Revolutionary War, and serving in that war against British oppression and British tyranny, and here are these little newborn, hyphenated Americans charging him, as well as me, with something "un-American"! What they meant was something "un-Irish," and we might just as well be plain about it. They go on:

Republican opponents of the Versailles treaty and the League of Nations are filled with righteous indignation over the opposition to the "harmless" four-power pact. Opposition Senators declare that if there was any real warrant for complaint over the alleged failure of Woodrow Wilson to supply data concerning the Versailles treaty, far better ground for distrust exists now because of the frank admission that no data on the evolution of the Pacific treaty are in existence.

"The alleged failure of Woodrow Wilson to furnish information." Who alleged it? The German-American and the Irish-American societies in the United States, the very fellows who are alleging this.

The doors of the Washington conference were closed to the people.

The only instance in all history, except at Versailles, of full accounts beforehand and afterwards being sent out to the press of the whole world as to what people were talking about and what people were trying to do in diplomatic circles took place here at the city of Washington. Any man who pretends that anything was kept from him or from anybody else who read the daily newspapers in either of those conferences is guilty, in my opinion, of self-deception, not to word it more strongly.

The doors of the Washington conference were "closed to the people"!

What people? German-American people, who did not want to understand, even if they could hear?

And the result is that no one knows what happened behind those barred doors—except those who prefer to keep quiet about it.

I hold no brief for the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I never agreed with him about anything of a political character in my life, as far as I remember, and I hope to God I will die without having been guilty of ever agreeing with him about anything; but I do know something about the Senator from Alabama.

Those who prefer to keep quiet about it.

One of the peculiarities about OSCAR UNDERWOOD is that even when he wants to keep quiet he does not know how. I have frequently wished that he did know how.

Mr. President, before I go on with this, let me say that if there is one thing I despise in the world it is a man who makes an attack upon me and other people, and when I return the attack in self-defense "pleads the baby act." No man can go through this world hitting other people, if he is a sure enough man, without expecting other people to hit him back. Let us see further what this says. It goes on:

The Times—

That is, the New York Times—

is plainly worried, not regarding the effect of the treaties upon the United States but the effect the rejection will have on Great Britain.

The New York Times, not an American paper but a British paper, according to this fellow, does not regret anything which may happen to America, but is regretting what may happen to Great Britain. As far as I know, none of its subscribers, none of its editors, and none of its writers are British subjects; they are all American citizens. This is a miserable, contemptible, and cowardly attack, and yet when you resent it, there is "the baby act" plea in response to you.

She won't like us any more—

"She" is Great Britain—

won't try to make more treaties with us. We believe she will not—for a time, at least—and that the rejection of the treaties by the Senate of the United States will serve notice upon her that we stand for "no entangling alliances"—

As if any alliance could be otherwise than entangling; at least to the extent of its worded provisions—and refuse to yield to the blandishments of her diplomats what could not be wrung from us as a nation on the field of battle.

From us, now, as a nation, "on the field of battle." The Americans who fought the War of Independence were Scotch and English and Welsh and Scotch-Irish. This crowd, now howling and pleading the baby act, had nothing to do with it. Twenty years after the Revolution a cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church, a Carroll of the State of Maryland, mentioned the fact that there were at that time but 26 Roman Catholic priests in America and 26,000 communicants, and most of those were English Catholics in the State of Maryland. If at that time Louisiana had been acquired, a great many of them would have been French Catholics and not Irish Catholics at all.

Who fought the battles of the Revolution? Did they fight them? They were not here to fight them. Most of them came over in the Irish potato panic and starvation period of 1848 and 1849, long after the War of the Revolution was over.

The Senate of the United States will never become a rubber stamp in the hands of those who like to "back out" in the presence of "royalty."

Accusing me of "backing out," and above all things "in the presence of royalty." God knows I never knew any royalty in my life, and never have had the slightest desire to know any, and nobody else of my kith or kin did. I belong to that race in Britain which never had any native nobility. The men who could sing and the men who could fight took charge in peace and took charge in war of the Welsh and British clans. We had no nobility.

All this, though, goes without saying, and the minute I reply to it by merely mentioning the names of the assailants, I must be accused, in the cloakrooms, at any rate, of "making an unprovoked attack upon the Irish-American citizenship" of the United States. I did not make the attack; they made it; and they made it upon me. They made it upon my honor; they made it upon my patriotism; they made it upon everything that my ancestors have gloried in, everything I have stood for, and everything that I hope my children and grandchildren will stand for. I say it is cowardly to attack me and then to plead the baby act, in or outside of the cloakroom, because I resent the attack.

Let me read a little further:

They indicate, merely—

Referring to the late attempts of the Parliament of Great Britain to bring about peace in Egypt and in India and in Ireland—a very laudable attempt, I think—but referring to them, this screed says:

They indicate, merely, that the scene of battle has been transferred from within the Empire to the United States.

A scene of battle in the British Empire "transferred to the United States." How? The fellow who wrote this, if it were one fellow, knows what he means; he knows how, and he is partially telling the truth. It was not the British Empire that attempted to "transfer the scene of battle," but the Irish-Americans of the United States. They hope to win in popular elections in America by the cowardice of politicians what they fear they might lose somewhere else—at home.

They indicate merely that the scene of battle has been transferred from within the Empire to the United States, where Great Britain hopes to accomplish by diplomacy and intrigue what she can not accomplish by force. The ruling class realizes that the conscience of the world has been awakened and aroused at the story of tyranny and oppression within her own domains, and that some effort must be made to satisfy an outraged public opinion, particularly in America.

Why "particularly in America"?

Mr. President, Great Britain has many sins to answer for—oppression in India, oppression in Egypt, oppression in Ireland. Her sins are her sins and not my sins. I and my ancestors parted from her long ago, and we are no longer responsible for her sins; we are not answerable for them before any tribunal of God or of men.

I never read Campbell's poem—

O'Connor's pale and lovely child; or, The flower of love lies bleeding—without finding it difficult to restrain my tears. I know the sufferings of the Irish people in Ireland, not only of the Roman Catholic Irish in south Ireland when the Protestants were in control, but of the Presbyterians and the Episcopalian Irish in north Ireland when Tyrone and the Roman Catholics under James II were temporarily in control. I know the whole long story of mutual outrages—women raped by both sides, children killed, men murdered. I have no sympathy with either of them. I have lost all sympathy with the majority, because I have been born and bred a member of the minority in this country, sectionally and politically. But it strikes me now and then that men who are worried to death about the freedom of the Irish under the British flag might take some little notice of the servility of the Filipinos and the dissatisfaction of the Porto Ricans under the American flag.

I do not want to keep any unwilling people subject to any flag anywhere—my flag or anybody else's. As a Senator of the United States I have no right to speak in my political capacity except concerning the subjugated races that are subjugated to my own flag, and for them I have always spoken. This paper continues:

Therefore she sends out offers of conciliation, of compromise, of concession, hoping to thus blind the people of this country until the end she seeks has been achieved here.

Who, Mr. President, doubts the power of Great Britain to reconquer Ireland to-morrow if she wanted to? The man who doubts the power of 50,000,000 brave people to reconquer 5,000,000 other brave people must be crazy. The most heroic struggle ever made in the history of the world against conquest was made by the people of the Southern States against those of the Northern States in this Union. We were at least one-third of our opponents in man strength, and we could keep the war up for only four years. The very men who talk about Great Britain "pretending to concede and compromise" are the very men who know that their only hope of life or safety consists in the magnificent common sense of the British people, which has declined to carry on a war of reconquest against Ireland—a people headed by that magnificent Welshman, David Lloyd-George, who stood in a position where he could mediate between the two races; who did not want to exterminate the Irish race; who did not want to reconquer Ireland; whose every thought and every idea and every instinct was opposed to it; and yet, instead of showing any degree of gratitude to him, this fellow writes it "is a mere pretense."

We did not find any such pretense from you men of Massachusetts and Illinois when we were down. You did not make any pretense that you were going to let us up. You not only carried your battalions, joined by all the $13-a-month men whom you could collect from Europe, against us but you kept up the war 10 years after the war had ended with carpetbaggers and scalawags and niggers. But we never pled the baby act. No southerner has ever yet pled it. We never sought a scapegoat; no southerner has ever yet sought one. It would have been easy for us to have blamed Jeff Davis and his cabinet and various other people, but we did not.

We just said, "The sin is ours if there be a sin; the subjugation is ours if it be subjugation. Meanwhile we are men and we are going to try to live as men, and we are not going to plead the baby act." Now, listen to this:

The liberty and independence—

Mark that, Mr. President—of America are for the moment at stake.

The independence of America is at stake right now! Did you know that, Mr. President? You had not learned it, had you? Do you not know really that our independence is at stake right now? Our territorial integrity, I suppose, is also at stake. What upstanding southerner in this body or what northerner, either, is in the slightest degree afraid about the "independence" of the United States? Where are we right now as compared with the balance of the earth? Counting all the gold under our feet and sitting right on top of it and defying the world to get any of it—the balance of the world without cash or credit, and unable even to buy what we have—and now we are proposing out of pure partisan insolence to prevent the balance of the world from paying us even in the products of their labor, because we are threatening to put the highest protective tariff there ever was upon everything that they can possibly ship to us, so that we can say to them, "You have neither cash nor credit, and, so far as we are concerned, you have no products, either; so you can not trade with us at all."

The liberty and the independence—and the independence of America are for the moment at stake.

This is not only the crowd that pleads the baby act whenever you resent their attack; this crowd is making the attack; it is the crowd that you wanted to let alone provided they would let you alone, but they would not. The liberty of the Senator from North Carolina is at stake! The independence of America is at stake to-day—

Through the intrigues of England, Japan, and France—

Generally they leave France out, because they think France has a sort of traditional friendship for us, and they cultivated it by leaving her out of their censures, but this time this monumental ass put her in.

And if liberty fades from the United States, then liberty is lost to the world.

This is not the fellow who was pleading the baby act, remember; this is the fellow who was making the attack bravely and valiantly, not braggartly or cowardly! That came later.

In defeating the designs England has on America at this time, and in throwing a ray of light on her propaganda—

Listen to this now—

the Friends of Irish Freedom feel that they are best serving the interests—

That they are best serving the interests of what? America? The United States? No; but of Ireland. His pen slipped again. Well, I frankly confess that I am not a Senator from Ireland. That is not all of this; there is a heap more of it. Speaking of the so-called English propaganda he says:

It has all but destroyed the facts of the Revolution.

Now, what was the outstanding fact of the Revolution? American independence. These united colonies became these United States. Is anybody who is not an ass contending that this fact of the Revolution is either destroyed or threatened at this minute? This was written by people who are not Americans; who take no glory in America; who take no courage from America, but imagine that they were standing for something outside of America in America's name.

It has all but destroyed the facts of the Revolution, and now reaches out to make this country a dependent of the British Empire.

That thing was sent to me and sent to some other Senators, I reckon; in fact, I reckon all of you received it. This little clique of hyphenated Americans imagined that you and I were asses enough to think we were about to become "dependents of the British Empire," or else they were plainly lying. They either thought we were fools enough to believe it, or else they knew we were smart enough not to believe it, and in that event were simply lying.

A dependent of the British Empire—more dependent than the original Colonies ever were—because "the forest of giant oaks" of American statesmen has all but fallen into decay.

My friends, who were the trees in "the forest of giant oaks of America" when we won the independence of this country? George Washington, English, every drop of his blood; Thomas Jefferson, Welsh and Scotch, every drop of his blood; the Randolphs, Scotch, with a little sprinkling of English; the Adamses, English all the way through, from old Samuel down to John Quincy and the modern family of that name; the Livingstons, Scotch and English. And, by the way, I picked up a paper this morning which referred to Andrew Jackson and Patrick Henry as being Irishmen. Patrick Henry's father and mother were born and raised in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, and neither he nor his father or mother ever saw Ireland in all their lives. He was named after his uncle, who was a clergyman of the Anglican Church, the Church of England, in Scotland, and probably left because the Presbyterians got too much of an underhold there and he had to leave. Andrew Jackson's father was born in Lowestoft, the very people of all the world who have the biggest quarrel with the Irish and have carried that quarrel on until now. And somebody yesterday suggested the Duke of Wellington was born in Ireland. Yes; he was born in Ireland, and was a member of a Norman family in the "English garrison" in Ireland.

I am getting a little tired of this pretense that the only real American people in America are the hyphenated Americans. I happened to be in Wales one morning and asked a gentleman a question. He responded to me in Welsh. I said, "You are barking up the wrong tree; I can not speak Welsh"; but he said, "You are Welsh; you look it." I acknowledged that I partially was, but nearly 300 years removed.

It has all but destroyed the facts of the Revolution.

The chief facts of the Revolution were local self-government and American independence; and if either one of them is either destroyed or threatened I can not see it.

And now reaches out to make of this country a dependent of the British Empire.

It not only becomes a dependent but it becomes one of the many dependents of the British Empire, according to this.

More dependent than the original Colonies ever were, because "the forest of giant oaks" of American statesmen has all but fallen into decay.

Do they not regret it—this "falling into decay" and all that?

Oh, there is lots more of it, but I do not believe I will bore the Senate with it all.

Here is a quarrel, which I read on page 7 of this miserable, false screed, with Canada and the British West Indies for offering to give Great Britain "preferential tariff rates." Why, we do not give to Mississippi and New York and Montana and California "preferential tariff rates." We go further and put them all behind a common tariff wall; and if Great Britain to-morrow were to pass a tariff law up to the size of ours, excluding our products from all her dominions, except when we pay a tax equal to that which we levy upon products coming to our shores from her and them, we would have no national right to complain. Great Britain has permitted her colonies to make tariffs against herself. Australia has tariffs against British products; so has Canada; so have the West Indies.

I hold no brief for Great Britain. I am not a British subject. None of my ancestors have been since Jim Williams died at Kings Mountain, and since John Williams led his regiment under Washington's immediate control in New Jersey, and under Greene in North Carolina, so what does all this nonsense mean?

And then the Right Rev. "Michael J. Gallagher"—Michael J. Gallagher, the right reverend—makes a little speech, too, out at Detroit. There is nothing Irish about him. There is no Roman Catholic religiousism in him, I suppose, although he is a right reverend; but he hides himself behind both, and makes an attack upon me and upon us, and I dare say if I replied to his attack or even read what he said and made a few remarks in explanation and defense against his harangue I would be accused of being irreligious as well as un-American and unpatriotic; but I have an old-fashioned notion that a preacher had better obey St. Paul's injunction and "preach Christ and him crucified" and nothing else, and that he has not anything to do with politics, and especially nothing to do with international politics. But he closes his magnificent "American" oration, in the name of "Michael J. Gallagher," a bishop of Rome and subject to Rome, with these words:

Yet we are going to repudiate the traditions of Washington, the guiding star of our Nation for decades.

Imagine George Washington being the guiding star of a Roman Catholic bishop!

We are about to enter into entangling alliances with foreign powers.

That refers to this treaty.

Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate for having addressed it at all; but I learned in the cloakroom late on yesterday afternoon, and I learned again this morning, that somebody was accusing me of "going out of my way" to bring the Irish-Americans into this discussion, and I wanted the Senate and the country to know that it was not I who went out of my way, but that it was they who went out of their way to attack me and every other American Senator who is voting for these treaties and world peace to the limited extent of their purview.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I desire very briefly to say something about the reservation which the Committee on Foreign Relations have proposed to the so-called quadruple or four-power treaty. That reservation reads:

The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

The treaty itself is so important not alone because of its inherent value both to the United States and to the world but as well because of our national pride for it as one of the great results of the Disarmament Conference, which had its origin in American minds and hearts, that I earnestly hope this treaty may be speedily ratified by the Senate.

It is not too much to say that the failure of this four-power treaty may result in the failure of the disarmament treaty, which, because of its more spectacular provisions, is perhaps far better known and is universally approved, and such jeopardy of the disarmament agreement that will inevitably exist if the instant treaty fails must not be overlooked.

It is manifest that if the present four-power treaty, which has to do with the stabilizing of potentially troublesome questions in connection with the islands of the Pacific and in connection with the Far East, is not ratified, there will immediately become apparent a disinclination, if not a refusal, to ratify the treaty providing for naval disarmament, because such international disarmament is logically dependent upon a reasonable expectation that at least future difficulties related with the Pacific, as they may arise, shall be determined by peaceful means.

I shall vote whole-heartedly for the treaty, without any reservation, and shall even vote for the treaty with the reservation as proposed by the committee in case the reservation is adopted; and, in fact, I would vote for the reservation itself, unnecessary as I shall attempt to show it to be, if I thought that the ratification of the treaty could be more promptly secured by the reservation; but I can not refrain from expressing some views with regard to the reservation itself.

This reservation creates a situation that is far more apt to produce misunderstanding than to eliminate misunderstanding. The reservation itself is in greater need of explanation than the treaty which it attempts to explain. On the face of it, the reservation declares an absurdity, for it provides inter alia that under the terms of this treaty there is "no alliance." It may be quite true, as has been forcefully stated upon the floor of the Senate, that an alliance between nations means, ordinarily, an alliance that is offensive or defensive, or both, and that it contemplates the possible use of force; but that interpretation of an alliance can not be what is intended by the reservation in the use of the word "alliance," because the reservation in its other provisions expressly provides for such possible interpretations relating to force, and declares that under the terms of the treaty there is no "commitment to armed force." Then, to make it doubly clear, it provides that no such war-breeding alliance is contemplated, and there is the added provision in the reservation that, under the terms of this treaty, "there is no obligation to join in any defense"; so that the idea of any offensive or defensive alliance is entirely negatived in the express provisions of the reservation having to do both with an offensive alliance and with a defensive alliance, and having thus completely exhausted the idea of a defensive or an offensive alliance the reservation contains the language which creates this ridiculous absurdity.

Everyone knows, or by reference to any standard dictionary can easily ascertain, that the term "alliance" in its general sense is substantially synonymous with the term "treaty"; that it means nothing more nor less than "a connection of interests between States" that is created "by treaties"; so that the reservation having by its other provisions expressly guarded against the defensive or offensive idea of an alliance, and giving to the word "alliance" its general meaning of a "treaty," which is the only meaning unprovided for in the reservation, we find that the reservation solemnly declares that "under the terms of this treaty there is no treaty."

The reservation is a gross imposition upon the treaty, whose terms are perfectly clear.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. There is no interruption.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the Senator to say just now that the effect of this reservation is to say that under the terms of this treaty there is no treaty. It says that under the terms of this treaty there shall be no alliance. Does the Senator contend that but for this reservation this treaty would form an alliance?

Mr. SPENCER. Undoubtedly; with or without the reservation there is an agreement or, what amounts to the same thing, an alliance to confer. If the Senator and I make an agreement between ourselves that in case of any possible difficulty in the future we will agree to a conference there is in the general acceptation of the word an alliance to confer; and precisely that alliance, and nothing more, is contemplated in this treaty.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator understands, then, that a mere agreement to confer, to talk over, constitutes an alliance?

Mr. SPENCER. An agreement to do anything constitutes, in its general meaning, an alliance—not an offensive or defensive alliance.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, I am not discussing that. I do not agree to that definition, however.

Mr. SPENCER. Such is the dictionary meaning of the word "alliance."

Mr. WILLIS. That is not my understanding of an alliance.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri—who is one of the most fluent Members of the Senate, though I notice that he is sticking to his manuscript this afternoon—why, if this is nothing more than an alliance to confer, the Senators on the other side vote against every amendment which would clearly state that meaning?

Mr. SPENCER. Because the meaning is clearly stated in the treaty itself, and any reiteration of it seems to me to be not only unnecessary but essentially unwise; if the treaty clearly expresses its meaning in its own terms then the Senator will agree with me that it is both unnecessary and unwise to add to those terms or to reiterate them.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator answer this question: How could a mere agreement or alliance to confer check and repel the aggressions of an outside nation upon the Pacific rights of either England, America, Japan, or France?

Mr. SPENCER. No one knows definitely; but I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia—and his knowledge of history is equaled by that of few in this body—to what has recently occurred. He knows as well as I that if there had been a conference in August, 1914, even of 48 hours' duration, there would have been no war. The Senator will remember how the Prime Minister of England, with a pathos that runs down through the years, begged for a conference of only 24 hours, and asserted that if he could get such a conference with the nations of the world he could avert the war that he saw impending. That is what a conference means sometimes.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. No doubt he thought so, and no doubt the Senator from Missouri thinks so; but how can anybody know it?

Mr. SPENCER. No one can know it absolutely until the Senator and I meet in heaven, and we read the history there.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the Senator also think that this language in this reservation—

There is no commitment to armed force—

Implies that there is a commitment to some other kind of force—for instance, commercial pressure, financial pressure? Yet I take it the Senator agrees with me that there is not any commitment in the treaty to any sort of force.

Mr. SPENCER. I quite agree with what the Senator says, for there is undoubtedly in the reservation an inference, at least, that some kind of force other than "armed force" may be intended by the treaty and sanctioned by the reservation, when, as a matter of fact, in the treaty itself there is not a word of force or war obligation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In other words, this reservation, in line with what the Senator says, really makes the treaty worse.

Mr. SPENCER. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire not to misunderstand the Senator. This Government, in the course of its history, has made very many treaties. Are we to understand it to be the contention of the Senator from Missouri that every time this Government has made a treaty it has entered into an alliance?

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Ohio has in his mind the ordinary meaning of an alliance, which contemplates force, which is pregnant with war, which means an offensive or defensive arrangement. That, I quite agree, is the ordinary meaning of an alliance—that when two nations agree with regard to offensive or defensive cooperation, there is an alliance. My point, however, is that this usual meaning of the word can not be what is intended in this reservation, because those meanings of "alliance" have been expressly provided for in the reservation, and therefore all that is left is the general meaning of the word "alliance;" and, as the Senator will find out if he will look into any standard dictionary, the general meaning of an alliance is any connection between States, usually by a treaty, and it is substantially synonymous with the word "treaty"; so that whenever there is a treaty there is in a general sense an alliance.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, what I am seeking to get at is what is in the Senator's mind with reference to the condition of this treaty if this reservation shall not be adopted. I understand him now to say that if this reservation is not adopted, and the treaty shall be ratified, this country then has entered into an alliance.

Mr. SPENCER. With or without the reservation, the agreement of the treaty provides, in a general sense, for an alliance to confer with other nations if difficulty arises. Could the Senator have any objection to such an alliance or to such an agreement to confer? What difference does it make whether you call it an agreement to confer or whether you call it an alliance to confer? A rose by any other name smells as sweet.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, since the Senator asks that question, I want to say that if I entertained the view of this treaty which the Senator seems now to entertain, I can not think of any condition under which I should support it. I would not vote for a treaty that took this country into an alliance. The American people decided that matter pretty fully a few months ago. I do not think that this treaty constitutes an alliance; but I do not desire to encroach upon the Senator's time.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator, I am sure, when he thinks of it again, will find that he has magnified a word and overlooked the meaning. Marriage is the most familiar instance of "an alliance." Surely the Senator does not think that marriage is "offensive and defensive" or is objectionable simply because it is called an "alliance." The word does not signify anything. The important thing is, what is intended and what is expressed. I do not care what it is called. The Senator is opposed, I see, to the use of the word "alliance." I do not like an alliance in its ordinary sense any more than the Senator from Ohio does, but I have no antipathy to the word "alliance" in the sense that makes it synonymous with the word "treaty."

I am prepared to admit, for academic purposes, that we have created a thousand alliances with a score of other nations, and that whenever we make a treaty we make an alliance, as we certainly do in the general acceptation of the word.

This reservation does not add a single thought, nor enforce a single provision of the treaty. At most, it simply reiterates what the treaty more clearly declares. It is reservation run wild. It arouses curiosity upon the reading of it as to what could have been the motive of any such attempt to add such evidently superfluous and unnecessary language to a treaty whose provisions are so simple and so clear as to be unmistakable in their meaning.

The treaty consists, in its substantial parts, of a brief preamble and four short articles. The preamble provides "with a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean," the four powers have concluded this treaty. Surely there is nothing in this preamble that necessitates any reservation, nor does the preamble mean anything more than an expression of the general desire of every thinking man in any one of the four powers that peace shall be preserved and that the rights of the respective parties shall be maintained and in such manner as is acceptable to and approved by each of the signatory nations.

It is axiomatic in its truth and has been the accepted position of the United States ever since this country has been a Nation.

The first article of the treaty provides that—

The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to effect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the other high contracting parties to joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

The essential words in this article are "respect their rights," "invited," "conference," "for consideration," and "adjustment." These are not the words that even remotely suggest war or force. They are the language of conference and consultation, and are not the language of struggle—but more than this, the possibility of their even indirectly suggesting any entangling alliance that would result in any obligation of any kind upon the United States to send a soldier or sailor anywhere in the world is absolutely banished when we remember that in a conference between sovereign nations, the very incident of sovereignty requires absolute independence of action for each nation, so that nothing can be binding upon any one of the parties without its express consent.

The result of a conference, in order to be obligatory upon the parties thereto, must be unanimous, because between sovereign nations the rule of unanimity is absolute. The majority rule is unknown. There can be no obligation upon a sovereignty, except by its own express consent, otherwise there would be no sovereignty.

There can be no obligation upon a sovereign nation by implication or by inference. Any obligation that is binding upon a sovereign nation must be so expressed in its terms as to definitely indicate an agreement by the nation whom it is sought to bind.

If under the terms of this article there should ever develop any controversy between the parties involving the rights referred to in the treaty, and that was likely to affect the status of peace, the high contracting powers agree that they will invite to a conference the other powers, in order to consider and adjust the matter. This agreement to invite a conference is the only obligation.

I do not care whether you call it an alliance or whether you call it an agreement, the main thing is, what does it mean? It means an obligation to invite other powers to a conference, and nothing more. It would be a sad day, both for this country and for the world if the United States should ever deliberately take any action that would indicate its unwillingness in case of any possible controversy in which it was concerned to invite and participate in a conference with the other parties concerned, in order if possible to consider and adjust the difficulties.

The second article provides that—

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measure to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

Recalling what I have said concerning the incidence of sovereignty by which no nation can be bound to do anything unless it expressly agrees so to do, what safer or more desirable provision could be imagined than the declaration that in case the rights of any of the parties to this treaty are threatened that they will at once fully and frankly communicate with each other to arrive at the most efficient measure to meet the situation.

It has been intimated that this article comes into effect only when there has been some actual attack, so that war has actually commenced, and that in such event the only possible means to meet the situation would be means that were at once offensive and defensive, but the mere reading of the article dissipates any such interpretation. There can be a thousand threats to existing rights by aggressive action, without the firing of a gun or an act of war.

When in regard to Venezuela the German Government once threatened to send, and perhaps did start, its armed vessels to enforce the collection of a debt due from Venezuela citizens to German citizens, there was a threat by aggressive action without any act of war, and it was fortunately entirely settled by the prompt interference of President Cleveland.

When England indicated in connection with the boundary line of Venezuela that armed force must be used in order to insure what Great Britain thought was the correct boundary line it was a threat by aggressive action to accomplish its purpose, but there was no act of war and the matter was wisely settled through the prompt interference of President Roosevelt.

The outstanding words in article 2 are "communicate fully and frankly"—"to arrive at an understanding"—"as to the most efficient measures to meet the particular occasion." This is not the language of war. This is the business language of consultation.

The third article of the treaty provides merely for its 10-year duration and its subsequent continuance until terminated on a 12-month notice, and obviously needs no reservation to explain or amplify its meaning.

The fourth article provides as to the method by which the treaty shall be ratified and become effective, and particularly declares one of the outstanding advantages of the treaty itself, and that is that immediately upon the coming into effect of this treaty "the agreement between Great Britain and Japan, which was concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate." This British-Japanese treaty was an alliance offensive and defensive, and provided for cooperation between the nations, and with armed force. It has always been regarded with a certain distaste, if not with actual anxiety in the United States, and if there was nothing else in the four-powers treaty except to terminate this British-Japanese treaty the four-powers treaty would be an outstanding accomplishment of exceeding importance.

The parties themselves limited the scope of the four-powers treaty to the mandated islands in the Pacific without in any sense creating an assent on the part of the United States to these mandates, and leaving the United States entirely free to deal with the mandatory powers in relation to the mandated islands. The powers themselves voluntarily excluded from consideration, under article 1 of the treaty, any question which was "exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers."

It does not make the slightest difference whether the treaty applies to the so-called mainland of Japan, or only to its island possessions. The purpose and the effect of the treaty are equally desirable whether applicable to the so-called mainland of Japan, as under its original terms it undoubtedly was, or whether it is confined to the insular possessions, as the parties themselves agreed by limiting its provisions, so far as Japan is concerned, to "include only Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin), Formosa, and the Pescadores, and the islands under the mandate of Japan."

When one leaves the realm of intangible and unreasonable speculation and rises above fanciful hypotheses which have no substantial foundation in fact and reads and considers the clearly expressed purposes and definite language of the treaty, there can be no reasonable doubt as to its meaning, and as to the entire absence of any necessity for any reservation, and particularly no doubt as to the unwisdom of the proposed reservation. It is not difficult to imagine that if the United States, within whose borders this treaty has just been written, are unwilling to accept its plain provisions, but insist upon adding thereto reservations which manfestly are unnecessary that the other signatory powers will at least have held up before them an example that may be productive of reservations far more complicating in their effect than the reiterating reservation which is here proposed.

In all probability no other power will ratify this treaty until the United States has acted upon it, and if we can not act with reasonable promptness upon a treaty that is as clear and simple in its provisions as this treaty, we present an unfortunate spectacle to the world. I have the most profound respect both for the patriotism and wisdom of the Senate of the United States in its aggregate action. It is a great bulwark of safety to American institutions and to constitutional rights, and it is therefore with no little misgiving that I contemplate the possible action of the Senate that shall in effect say to the people of the United States, "We have received the treaty. Undoubtedly the American representatives, Secretary Hughes, Senator Lodge, Senator Underwood, Elihu Root, were entirely agreed upon its terms, and each of them definitely understood what it was to which they intended to agree in this treaty and were assured both as to the wisdom of the provisions and as to the adequacy of the expression of those provisions, but while we, the Senate, know that there was no misunderstanding among them, nevertheless we find that their ability to use the English language in order to express their unanimous opinion was so imperfect that we, the Senate of the United States, find it necessary to clothe in adequate English what the American representatives undoubtedly had clearly in mind, and what they vainly and imperfectly tried to express."

It is, in my judgment, an absurd position for the Senate of the United States to take. The treaty is simple in its provisions and unmistakable in its language, and needs no reservation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator yield to me that I may ask a question of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator from Missouri has explained, with great eloquence and power, that he is opposed to the pending reservation. I invite his attention to the fact that on February 10 the President of the United States, in presenting the treaties to the Senate, used the following language:

There is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no written or moral obligation to join in defense.

The language of the reservation is as follows:

The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

Since the President of the United States, who has the initiative in all foreign relations, placed upon the treaty this interpretation when he submitted it to the Senate, why does the Senator object to having the Senate place upon the treaty the interpretation already placed upon it by the President, and which he himself says he thinks is in entire harmony with the treaty as it stands?

Mr. SPENCER. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio, Mr. President, by the courtesy of the Senator from Connecticut, if I may answer, that there are eight pages of the President's address on this treaty, and why not incorporate them all in a reservation?

Mr. WILLIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPENCER. I think it would be equally as sensible as the reservation we have. Undoubtedly the President, in the presentation of the treaty to the Senate, in an address eight pages long, went over the discussion, explanation, and reiteration of what the treaty meant. His point was that the treaty needed no reservation because there was not a word of obligation in it. Why incorporate any of that address as a reservation when the point of the address was to show that there was no need of any reservation? I have no objection to the wording of the reservation; it means precisely what the treaty means; and the Senator could add the whole eight pages of the President's address as a reservation, as he says he would be glad to do, without changing its meaning; but I do not think it would be wise to do it.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand from the statement of the Senator from Missouri that it is his opinion that the substance of the reservation is already included in the treaty, but there are Senators on this floor who do not entertain the view which the Senator from Missouri entertains, and which I entertain. I put the practical proposition to the Senator, whether it is wise to imperil this great treaty, upon which the peace of the world depends, because the Senator is unwilling to put into the treaty that which he thinks is already in it, and which the President says is already in it.

Mr. SPENCER. That is a perfectly fair question. I said when I commenced the few remarks I made, that if I found or thought that in order to secure the ratification of this treaty it was necessary to vote for the reservation, I would vote for the reservation, unnecessary as I think it is, for I entirely agree with the Senator from Ohio that the ratification of the treaty, with or without the reservation, is the main thing. My point is that it ought to be ratified without the reservation, but if I can not get it without the reservation, of course, I shall take it with the reservation, because the reservation is not harmful in its provision. It is unnecessary in its reiteration; it offers an example to other nations that is unwise; and it complicates rather than helps the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send to the desk and ask that the Secretary read for the information of the Senate a proposed unanimous-consent agreement to see if we can fix a day for coming to a vote on the pending treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Asssistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that no vote shall be taken upon any amendment or reservation that may be pending or that may be proposed to Executive N, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan relating to their insular possessions and their insular dominions in the Pacific, until the calendar day of Tuesday, March 21, 1922; that beginning at 3 o'clock p. m. on Wednesday, March 22, 1922, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 30 minutes upon any pending amendment or reservation or any amendment or reservation that may thereafter be offered, or more than once or longer than one hour upon the treaty itself; and that on the calendar day of Friday, March 24, 1922, the Senate shall convene at 12 o'clock meridian and shall immediately proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or reservation that may then be pending or that may be offered, and immediately thereafter upon the resolution of ratification of said Executive N, as amended by a reservation or reservations or otherwise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the agreement, but I should like to ask a question for information. As the agreement is proposed, does it mean that there shall be no vote on pending amendments and reservations until Wednesday, the 22d of March?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not until next Tuesday; and commencing on Wednesday, the following day, debate is to be limited to a half hour on a reservation or amendment and to an hour on the treaty itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The proposition is to postpone the vote on amendments and reservations until next Tuesday?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Until next Tuesday.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	Nelson	Simmons
Borah	Harrison	New	Smith
Brandegee	Heflin	Newberry	Spencer

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] are absent from the Chamber in attendance on the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent presented by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I and others have collaborated with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] in the preparation of the proposed agreement. The agreement does not so specify, but I presume the understanding is that the treaty will be kept before the Senate so long as any Senator desires to speak upon it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator is asking me for my view of the matter, I desire to say that I understand that has been the ruling of the Chair in relation to similar agreements in the past; that whenever a Senator desired to speak upon a treaty the Senate would proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session; that a Senator might make a speech upon the treaty at any time he had a mind to; but if no Senator desired to speak upon the treaty, then the Senate could engage in legislative business.

I will say to the Senate that the Senator from Arkansas and other Senators came to me and stated that quite a number of Senators desired to go away, to be absent for the remainder of this week, but they did not want to be absent at the time of any vote on amendments or reservations that might come before the Senate. Therefore the principal object of the agreement was to provide that there should be no vote on any amendment or reservation until next Tuesday, at which time those Senators who find it necessary to leave the city could return. Of course, in proposing the agreement I have no disposition to limit the time of Senators in the discussion of this important matter; they ought to take all the time they want, and yet I suppose no Senator intends to attempt to prevent a final vote upon the treaty. If that is so, and if we can agree upon a date to vote upon the reservations and amendments and the treaty to a final conclusion, then every Senator will know when to be here for the final vote. It would be a great convenience to all of us, I am sure.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course it is possible under this agreement, if it shall be entered into, to take up the other treaties which are now pending. I assume, however, that there will be no desire to take them up for final disposition?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think that anybody intends to do that. I am sure I do not, and I assume that if the Senate is not engaged upon this treaty it will take up in legislative session the judges' bill, which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has before the Senate, and other legislative measures.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, as I heard the proposed unanimous-consent agreement read, it seemed to me that if a Senator spoke upon an amendment for half an hour he was debarred from speaking upon the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At the place I have in mind I think the agreement instead of reading "or" should read "and."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the Secretary again read the agreement, if he pleases. I thought it did read "or," as the Senator desires that it shall. Let us have it read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The agreement, I think, should read "and."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the proposed agreement be again read.

Mr. FRANCE. I ask that the entire agreement be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; let the Secretary read the entire agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that no vote shall be taken upon any amendment or reservation that may be pending or that may be proposed to Executive N, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan relating to their insular possessions and their insular dominions in the Pacific, until the calendar day of Tuesday, March 21, 1922; that beginning at 3 o'clock p. m. on Wednesday, March 22, 1922, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon any pending amendment or reservation or any amendment or reservation that may thereafter be offered, or more than once or longer than one hour upon the treaty itself; and that on the calendar day of Friday, March 24, 1922, the Senate shall convene at 12 o'clock meridian, and shall immediately proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or reservation that may then be pending or that may be offered, and immediately thereafter upon the resolution of ratification of said Executive N, as amended by a reservation or reservations or otherwise.

Mr. ROBINSON. The agreement follows the wording usually employed in such agreements.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that language is ambiguous; but it may be interpreted. Is it meant by the language used that a Senator who has spoken a given length of time upon an amendment or reservation may also speak the specified length of time upon the treaty itself?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that is what it means. If Senators will accept that statement as their understanding of the agreement, it will interpret the agreement.

Mr. BORAH. I presume that would be the rule, the same as when a treaty is reported.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The same as if Senators would protest against a reservation and it is agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. I do not accept that rule there, but I will here. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question. The Chair has heretofore ruled that a Senator could not utilize his hour until the main bill or treaty was before the Senate; that is, while an amendment was pending a Senator could not utilize his hour, but would have to confine himself to 30 minutes, and could not speak upon the treaty until the treaty itself was before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that I do not want the agreement to operate in that way? I should like to have it so framed that a Senator may take his hour upon the treaty itself and say anything he has a mind to upon the treaty or upon the reservations in an hour's speech.

Mr. ROBINSON. If there were a number of reservations or amendments on the table, the Senator from Connecticut would not want a Senator to take an hour on the treaty and then a half hour on each reservation? Otherwise, there is no use of imposing a limitation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not see when a Senator may take an hour on the treaty if reservations are to be offered up to the time of the presentation of the resolution of ratification and each Senator may talk for half an hour on each reservation and amendment. There will always be a reservation or an amendment pending before the Senate until the resolution of ratification is voted on.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, though, under the terms of this agreement no amendment or reservation is to be voted on until next Tuesday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the meantime a Senator may speak an hour. Indeed, he may speak as long as he pleases, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If any Senator desires to speak before next Tuesday, of course he may do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The limitation does not apply until then.

Mr. NORRIS. The limitation does not apply until then; but I wish to say to the Senator from Connecticut that it does not necessarily follow that a Senator may not speak for an hour on the treaty until after all the reservations have been disposed of. Of course, it is true that he could not do that if there were formally pending an amendment or reservation, but after an amendment was disposed of the Senator who obtained the floor before another amendment was offered, the treaty still being before the Senate, could then speak for an hour on the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In practice I think there will be a reservation or an amendment pending all the time until the vote comes on the resolution of ratification.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose there is an amendment or a reservation pending and it is disposed of, voted up or voted down, and I get the floor immediately afterwards, I can then talk for an hour on the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; and then some Senator, of course, may offer another amendment or reservation.

Mr. NORRIS. He could not do that if I had the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I want to have it understood that a Senator may divide his time to suit himself. He may have an hour at his disposal on the treaty and half an hour on each amendment, in any event, but if he wants to divide his time and speak for half an hour on any amendment and then use some of his time on the treaty, he should have that privilege.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that being made the specific agreement. I do not want, however, to have any understanding which will violate the recent decision of the Chair, which, it seems to me, was only just and fair, that, as a matter of fact, while a Senator may talk about anything he pleases under the rules of the Senate, technically he is talking to the question that is then pending before the Senate, and if there is a motion pending that is what the Senator is talking about, even though he is actually talking about something else.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator that I think the question is largely academic, for this reason: There is not a single reservation or amendment that has been proposed or that can be proposed to the treaty that does not involve a discussion of the treaty, and a Senator to discuss intelligently a reservation must discuss the whole treaty in all its aspects; but it is perfectly immaterial to me how Senators settle the division of time. I do not want 10 minutes on the matter myself; and if I can not express my views in that time I will resign; but, Mr. President, all I care about is to give the Senate a chance to fix some day when they will stop the conversation and come to a vote.

Mr. BORAH. I have not any objection to the proposed agreement; I am not objecting to it; I simply desire that it may be understood that a Senator may divide his time to suit himself.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would have no objection to that being done, if it were so provided; but I would not want an erroneous interpretation of the unanimous-consent agreement, because I think the ruling which has been referred to is a salutary one.

Mr. BORAH. I do, too.

Mr. LENROOT. If an express provision shall be provided to cover the point raised, I shall have no objection, but I think it ought to be in the agreement.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is a good idea. I think the Chair has been correct in his ruling, and I am not finding any fault with it. I think, ordinarily speaking, it is a proper one, but in this very exigency I should like to have an exception to the rule, which is a good thing in order to prove the rule.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator suggest a form of words that he would like to interline?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] perhaps will do that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. LENROOT. The language reads:

> No Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon any pending amendment or reservation, or any amendment or reservation that may thereafter be offered, or more than once or longer than one hour upon the treaty itself.

Then I would suggest inserting:

> Which may be utilized at any time.

Mr. ROBINSON. That will do it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] advises me that he does not like the provision that no Senator may speak more than once on an amendment. His idea is that a Senator might not want to speak a half hour on an amendment; that he might want to speak five minutes on the amendment at first, and then answer another Senator's suggestions with five minutes more. He suggests that no Senator shall be allowed to take more than a half hour of time on any one amendment, and that he may divide it to suit himself.

Mr. REED. That he shall not speak in all more than 30 minutes on any amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; that he may speak as often as he has a mind to, but not to exceed 30 minutes in all.

Mr. REED. The reason for the suggestion is this: We have had it illustrated many times. A Senator offers an amendment; he has to present it, and after he has presented it some Senator raises objections to which he may want to reply, and he is cut off from defending his own amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it would be perfectly immaterial to the Senate how many times a Senator spoke on his amendment, provided he did not occupy more than a half hour altogether.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, under the general rules of the Senate, without any agreement, a Senator would be precluded from speaking more than twice.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He would.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not suppose the Senator would care to modify that rule.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; but we are making a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we say here that no Senator shall speak more than twice, and not longer than 30 minutes in the aggregate, on any amendment.

Mr. REED. That will do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In order to present an amendment or reservation properly a Senator has to engage in different colloquies, and he may want to take the floor four or five times of five minutes each. I do not see why he should not be allowed to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course that modifies the general rule; but the Senator can wait until all of them are through, if he has only 30 minutes to use, and close the debate with the balance of his time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He can do it, yes; but I was not urging this, the Senator will understand. I was trying to comply with the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but I also understand that this is satisfactory to the Senator from Missouri. I do not care about it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will ask the Secretary to state the unanimous-consent agreement as he has it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that no vote shall be taken upon any amendment or reservation that may be pending or that may be proposed to Executive N, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and their insular dominions in the Pacific, until the calendar day of Tuesday, March 21, 1922; that beginning at 3 o'clock p. m. on Wednesday, March 22, 1922, no Senator shall speak in the aggregate for a period of more than 30 minutes upon any pending amendment or reservation or any amendment or reservation that may thereafter be offered, or more than once or longer than one hour upon the treaty itself, which hour may be utilized at any time; and that on the calendar day of Friday, March 24, 1922, the Senate shall convene at 12 o'clock meridian, and shall immediately proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or reservation that may then be pending or that may be offered, and immediately thereafter upon the resolution of ratification of said Executive N, as amended by a reservation or reservations or otherwise.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to object to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement. Indeed, I never have objected to any. I do not like it, though, and the reason why I do not like it is this:

The most important business that has come before us during the year is this particular treaty. Upon it now are focused the attention and consideration of the Senate and the attention of the country, too. It is the business that is here. Personally, I would rather proceed with that business. Whether it be concluded in two days or two weeks, so far as I am concerned, would be immaterial; but I prefer that the business now before us be kept before us and continued before us and that we devote ourselves exclusively to it.

I have seen these agreements in my brief service in this Chamber in the past. The instant this agreement is adopted that instant will your attention flag until you come to next week, when you begin upon your half-hour and your hour rule. Your Members will be absent. They will be paying little attention. The focus of the consideration that is necessary for the determination intelligently and accurately and patriotically of this great matter will be lost for the time being.

So, Mr. President, with the expression of that view on my part, and the statement, too, that I never take up the time of the Senate unnecessarily, and much in any event, I make no objection to this proposed agreement; but I think it is a mistake, in view of the importance of the subject before us and under the circumstances that have been developed here in respect to this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if no Senator desires a secret executive session, I am about to move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

RELIEF OF FARMERS IN CROP-FAILURE AREAS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 164).

Mr. LADD. I present the conference report on Senate bill 2897 and ask that it lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the conference report ought to be printed in the RECORD. The object is to print it for the information of Members of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rules require it to be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2897) to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, and 6, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum $1,000,000 proposed by said amendment insert "$1,500,000," and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"An act to appropriate $1,500,000 for the purchase of seed grain to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

And the House agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the amendment of the House numbered 4.

E. F. LADD,
PETER NORBECK,
JOHN B. KENDRICK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. McLAUGHLIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, having arrived at a unanimous-consent agreement as to voting on the treaty, I do not think it will be necessary to take a recess. If to-morrow the Senate desires to take up the treaty, it can proceed with executive session. Therefore, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 16, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. WALSH as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou whose name is Holy, come with us, be around about us, go before us, and all shall be well. Illuminate all thoughts of the future with the sense of Thy guiding presence. Forgive our unworthiness and all those hours in which we have forgotten Thee. We entreat Thee that our problems may be solved and our necessities answered. Grant a mighty blessing to our country, that she in turn may be a great strength to this weary, woeful world. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent—

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee was granted leave of absence for one day on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order entered into, the business in order to-day of Calendar Wednesday has been dispensed with and it is in order to-morrow.

CONFERENCE REPORT—DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill, H. R. 10663.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the conference report on the deficiency bill, which the Clerk will report.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior years, and for other purposes, had further insisted upon its amendments numbered 26, 27, and 60, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had requested a further conference with the House, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. GLASS as the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

APPROPRIATION TO PURCHASE SEED GRAIN, ETC.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. HAUGEN. To submit a conference report for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa submits a report on the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2897) to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ordered printed under the rules.

DEFICIENCY BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman when he expects to call up this report?

Mr. HAUGEN. Probably to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Iowa that to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then probably on Friday, unless I can have unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I assumed the conference report was over from the Senate, so that I renew my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the conference report on the deficiency bill. The Clerk will read the report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

MARTIN B. MADDEN,
J. G. CANNON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the amount of the bill as it passed the Senate was $138,026,763.97. The amount of the bill as it passed the House was $108,537,386.51. Added by the Senate, $29,489,477.46. Of the amount added by the Senate, $27,468,000 is for the payment of refunds for internal-revenue taxes illegally collected, mainly income taxes; $671,303.92 is for the payment of judgments and audited claims; $460,333.33 General Accounting Office; and the remainder is distributed among the other departments in the bill. The Senate has receded from $320,433.77. General Accounting Office, 253 additional clerks for the remainder of this year and for next year is still in disagreement and amounts to $460,333.33. The House has receded from disagreement to Senate amendments and agreed to $28,708,710.36. The principal amendments to which the House has agreed are as follows: Refunding internal-revenue taxes illegally collected, $27,468,000; judgments and audited claims, $671,303.92; carrying out the provisions of the act reorganizing the Patent Office, $158,926.39; special assistants to the Attorney General and United States district attorneys, $100,000,000; rewards in the Postal Service, $35,000. I may say those awards in the Postal Service amounting to $35,000 are due to the necessity of paying rewards to those who have either killed or captured mail robbers. Operating force for public buildings, $36,000, and in regard to this item I wish to say that the janitor force throughout the United States connected with public buildings would have to be furloughed for some days some time before the end of the fiscal year unless this was allowed. Payment of court awards of land condemned for use at Walter Reed General Hospital, $94,703.44. This is in the form of a final judgment on which there is to be no appeal.

One of the amendments still in disagreement is No. 26, which is for the General Accounting Office, amounting in one case to $110,133.33, and in the other case to $350,000. I wish to say in this connection that the accounting office asked for 253 additional clerks. The cost of these clerks if carried for the remaining part of this year would be $110,000. If they were allowed for next year, in addition to the remaining part of this year, it would be $350,000 more. The accounting office for 1923 has already been allotted in appropriations in the independent offices bill $2,294,231. The amount made available for 1922 for that office from transfers of appropriations from the consolidated offices was $2,152,613.57, or an increase for 1923 over 1922 of $341,617.43. It was the opinion of the managers on the part of the House, in connection with the consideration of this bill in conference, that there ought not to be any additional clerks allowed in the accounting office. First, it was my understanding when the accounting office was organized and transferred to the present management that they could dispense with 600 clerks that were then there. They have not been dispensed with, but, on the other hand, about 250 additional clerks have been provided for 1923, and if we should provide the 253 additional clerks it seemed to your conferees they would be getting more people there than they ought to have.

Mr. Speaker, unless there is some gentleman who wishes time, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 26: Page 18, after line 20, insert:

GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE.

Salaries and expenses: For necessary clerical force to enable the General Accounting Office to properly audit and settle the accounts and claims growing out of the expansion of the work of the United States Veterans' Bureau and the payments of interest on the public debt, together with the settlement and payment of transportation claims, $110,333.33.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 26.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have a division on this, so that we may be able to tell the Senate how the vote stood.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

MINORITY VIEWS ON THE SOLDIERS' BONUS BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] to make a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that the minority may have until Saturday evening to file their views on the soldiers' bonus bill. I will say to the gentlemen of the House that the matter was discussed in the Ways and Means Committee, and there was no objection by those reporting the bill to this request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the minority may have until Saturday evening to file their views on the soldiers' bonus bill.

Mr. MANN. What is meant by the term "Saturday evening"?

Mr. GARNER. Any time before 12 o'clock Saturday night.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What month and year?

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to be stated.

Mr. GARNER. Before the House adjourns on Saturday next or before the Printing Office closes. It was understood, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, that this report will not interfere with the consideration of the bill, and it was not anticipated that the bill would be considered until next week.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it will interfere.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like the gentleman to state his request again.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority of the Ways and Means Committee, or any member of the minority, may have the right to file minority views not later than Saturday next on the bonus bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the minority, or any member of the minority, may have the right to file minority views on the soldiers' bonus bill any time before Saturday next. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think the Chair stated the request as the gentleman from Texas put it. The Chair stated "before Saturday." I understood the gentleman to request any time before 12 o'clock Saturday night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair endeavored to state the request exactly as the gentleman from Texas stated it, and there was nothing in the request about 12 o'clock as the gentleman last stated it. If that was the intention the Chair would be glad to restate the request.

Mr. GARNER. I do not recall what the Chair said. I asked unanimous consent that we have until Saturday night. The gentleman from Tennessee evidently understood that it was before Saturday. I intended to include Saturday in the request, and I think the reporter's notes will show it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It might have been made to include Saturday, but the Chair will again state the request. The gentleman from Texas requests that the minority, or any Member of the minority, may have until 12 o'clock Saturday night next to file minority views on the soldiers' bonus bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in the bill in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 27, page 19, after line 2, insert: "For necessary clerical force to enable the General Accounting Office to properly audit and settle the accounts and claims growing out of the expansion of the work of the United States Veterans' Bureau and the payments of interest on the public debt, together with the settlement and payment of transportation claims, fiscal year 1923, $350,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 27.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 1.

So the motion to further insist on disagreement to Senate amendment No. 27 was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 60: Page 46, after line 23, insert: "The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to rent, under such terms and conditions and for such period as he may prescribe, to the adjutant general of the State of Alabama, the buildings and premises of the United States situated at the northeast corner of Second Avenue and Eighteenth Street North, in Birmingham, Ala., known as the Old Government Building, or such parts thereof as may be properly utilized by the Alabama National Guard and other military and patriotic organizations."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves to recede and concur with an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 60, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

"In line 1 of the matter inserted in said amendment, strike out the words "and directed."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask that the same conferees be appointed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House Mr. MADDEN, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee.

On No. 27: Appropriates $3,600 for the compensation of the assistant to the Superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Buildings, as proposed by the House, instead of $4,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 30, 32, 33, and 34, relating to the United States Shipping Board: Inserts the language, proposed by the Senate, providing that no part of the moneys appropriated or made available by this act shall be used for the repair or reconditioning of any vessel until a reasonable opportunity has been given to the available Government navy yards to estimate upon the cost of such work, modified so as to permit the Government arsenals to bid on such work, and further modified so as to require estimates from the navy yards or arsenals when the expenses of such repair or reconditioning is in excess of $100,000, instead of $5,000, as proposed by the Senate. Strikes out, as proposed by the Senate, the provision that no part of the sums appropriated shall be used to pay a greater sum than 5 per cent as commissions for the placing of advertising matter contracted for; and strikes out the matter, inserted by the Senate, modifying the limitation placed by the House upon the appropriation for the payment of claims by the Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation; and strikes out, as proposed by the Senate, the prohibition on the use of Shipping Board or Fleet Corporation funds for the printing of "bulletins."

On Nos. 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, and 43, relating to the Veterans' Bureau: Inserts the language, proposed by the Senate, authorizing the purchase of passenger-carrying and other motor vehicles; appropriates $34,970,974.65 for salaries and expenses of the Veterans' Bureau as proposed by the Senate, instead of $25,815,942 as proposed by the House; appropriates $160,000,000 for military and naval compensation as proposed by the House, instead of $145,000,000 and not exceeding $15,000,000 of any unexpended balance as proposed by the Senate; appropriates $146,409,188.80 for vocational rehabilitation as proposed by the Senate, instead of $127,000,000 as proposed by the House; inserts the language, proposed by the Senate, limiting the use of Army camps or cantonments as training centers to Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, Ohio; and restores the language, stricken out by the Senate, which provides that no part of the foreging appropriation shall be expended for construction work except for necessary "repairs," instead of for necessary "minor repairs," as proposed by the House.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the following amendments of the Senate:

On No. 2, relating to the expenditure of part of the $25,000 appropriation for traveling expenses of the President for "official entertainment."

On No. 19, relating to the employees' compensation fund and providing for the advancement of costs for the enforcement of recoveries provided in sections 26 and 27 where necessary, and not exceeding $25 in any one case.

On No. 21, relating to the General Accounting Office and providing for a lump-sum in lieu of a detailed appropriation.

On No. 28, relating to an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the purchase of land in the city of Washington.

On No. 29, increasing the appropriation for the Tariff Commission from $300,000 to $375,000.

On No. 31, relating to the authority granted the United States Shipping Board to continue to use sums received from the liquidation of assets up to $55,000,000.

On No. 35, relating to the number of employees that may be employed by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation at a rate of compensation in excess of $11,000 per annum.

T. W. HARRISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the conference report.

Mr. DALLINGER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. DALLINGER. I rise to make the point of order that the conferees have exceeded their authority in Senate amendment No. 30, in agreeing to the new matter which they have agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that the conferees have exceeded their authority in agreeing to Senate amendment No. 30, on page 28 of the engrossed bill.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, in agreeing to it in a new draft. When this bill was before the House an amendment offered by me was adopted, which is found on page 31 of the bill, which read this way:

No part of the moneys appropriated or made available by this act shall be used or expended for the purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing which, at the time of the proposed purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning, can be manufactured, produced, repaired, or reconditioned in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States for a sum less than it can be purchased, acquired, repaired, or reconditioned otherwise: Provided, That this limitation shall only apply to vessels while in the harbors of the United States, and all expenditures in connection with such work are to be considered in estimating the cost.

Now, the Senate adopted an amendment to this, or rather in lieu of it, as follows:

No part of the moneys appropriated or made available by this act shall, unless the President shall otherwise direct, be used or expended for the repair or reconditioning of any vessel owned or controlled by the Government, if the expense of such repair or reconditioning is in excess of $5,000, until a reasonable opportunity has been given to the available Government navy yards to estimate upon the cost of such repair or reconditioning if performed by such navy yards within the limit of time within which the work is to be done: Provided, That this limitation shall only apply to vessels while in the harbors of the United States, and all expenditures in connection with such work are to be considered in estimating the cost: And provided further, That the provisions of this clause shall take effect upon the passage of this act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House has fixed no limit. As a matter of fact, when this matter was before the House the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE] offered an amendment providing for a limit of $25,000, and his amendment was voted down. Now the Senate adopts an amendment providing for a limit of $5,000, so that the difference between the two Houses is the difference between no limit and a limit of $5,000. I submit that it is exactly on a par with the rulings which have been given in this House with regard to tariff schedules. Supposing the House of Representatives in a tariff bill puts a certain article on the free list, and in the Senate an amendment is put on carrying a duty of 5 per cent. In that case the conferees are limited to the difference between nothing and a 5 per cent duty. They can not in a conference report impose a duty of 100 per cent on that article. So here the Senate puts a limitation of $5,000 upon the reconditioning, practically saying that as to repairs under $5,000 they would not have to get an estimate from the navy yard. The House imposed no limit at all.

Now, I submit that the power of the conferees was limited between those extremes—nothing and $5,000. They have imposed a limit of $100,000, or $95,000 more than the Senate itself provided in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts contending that the conferees must either have accepted the Senate amendment or the original language of the bill?

Mr. DALLINGER. I contend that if they were going to impose a limit they could not impose a higher limit than either House had imposed. That is the point. The House refused to impose any limit. The Senate imposed a limit of $5,000. I submit that they have gone and imposed a higher limit than either House imposed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that the conferees exceeded their authority in agreeing to the language in lieu of Senate amendment No. 30. It will be noticed that the original provision of the bill contained no limitation whatever providing for the purchase, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing on the part of the Government. The Senate struck out all of the language of the original House provision and inserted an amendment which required the reconditioning or repairs in excess of $5,000 to be done in Government yards under certain conditions. The conferees have agreed to substantially that language except that they have stricken out "$5,000" and inserted "$100,000." In the view of the Chair the whole controversy before the conferees was whether there should be a limitation upon the amount of the repairs, and if so, what the limitation should be; in other words, it was between $5,000 worth of repairs and no limit whatever.

This point has heretofore arisen, and a discussion occured on March 3, 1915, Sixty-third Congress, third session, RECORD, page 5469, when Mr. Speaker Clark ruled, in passing upon a point of order raised against the conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill, that where the House struck out all of the Senate amendment, not leaving a single line or word of that provision and substituting a new amendment, it put it in exactly the same condition as where the Senate or House struck out all after the enacting clause of a bill and inserted a new bill entirely. The Speaker then ruled that the conferees had carte blanche in drafting new language and inserting new provisions. He cited as a precedent paragraph 6424 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, the syllabus of which is that—

Where the disagreement is as to an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire text of a bill the managers have the whole subject before them, and may exercise a broad discretion as to details.

It seems to the Chair that this particular case is analogous to that situation, and that the conferees were authorized either to agree to the provision without any limitation whatever, or to a limitation of $5,000, or to any limitation between that and no limitation whatever, and that the point of order that they have exceeded their authority is not well taken. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this conference report why it was that he did not bring back to the House this particular amendment, as he promised to on February 27.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state to the gentleman from Iowa that on the morning when this bill was first called up and the request made to send it to conference objection was made or it was asked that it be put over until the next morning. On this first day there was a colloquy between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] and myself and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and myself with reference to this item. I stated at that time that, so far as I was concerned, the conferees would attempt to get as nearly as possible the language of the House, but I then stated that it was so absolutely impossible that if it became the law the Shipping Board could not operate a ship; and I stated at that time that, as far as I was concerned, it might be brought back to the House.

I am frank to say to the gentleman that on the next morning, when the matter was sent to conference, the gentlemen were not here, and there was no colloquy at all about it, nor was anything said with reference to it, but there was some request made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] with reference to bringing back some other items which are brought back; and I am free to say to the gentleman that I had forgotten what I did say with reference to bringing it back. But the amendment offered in the House is so absolutely impossible that it was the opinion of everybody upon the conference that to adopt that language would mean absolutely to destroy the usefulness of the Shipping Board and all of its operations. They could not even get a monkey wrench repaired without getting an estimate from an arsenal or from a navy yard. In consequence, as I say, I regret that the matter for the time was forgotten or overlooked by all; but if in the opinion of this House the amendment that was adopted by the House should be retained, it is a very easy matter to reject this report and send it back. In my opinion, if anyone has any desire at all that this Shipping Board shall operate or that it shall turn a wheel, he will not for a moment subscribe to the amendment adopted by this House on the original bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee and Mr. HULL rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me five minutes?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to sympathize with my friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], and the other gentlemen from Massachusetts who made such an able, earnest, and successful fight in putting through the amendment on this bill while it was under consideration in the House and which was designed to require the reconditioning of the Leviathan to be done in navy yards if it could be done at an expense not exceeding that to be incurred in private yards.

Mr. DALLINGER. Where it could be done for less than in private yards.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Where it could be done for less, as the gentleman suggests. I feel that the gentleman is entitled to some sympathy, because, due to the very great haste of the Shipping Board, I understand that that contract has already been let to a private concern; and even if Congress were now to adopt this amendment and make it a part of the law it could not possibly have the result which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] was desirous of accomplishing.

I understand more. I understand that the Shipping Board, in its haste to make this contract before Congress had an opportunity to finally adopt the amendment, and in face of the fact that both the House and the Senate had expressed their approval of the object of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Shipping Board has made a contract for the reconditioning of the Leviathan with the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., the president of which is Mr. Homer L. Ferguson, who now has a $11,000 position with the United States Shipping Board as a member of the claims commission. This gentleman was first appointed on the claims commission at $15,000 a year. Then, a year ago, when Congress put a limitation upon the appropriation bill, providing that not more than six of the employees of the Shipping Board should be paid in excess of $11,000, I understand his salary was reduced to $11,000, and that he is now a member of the United States Shipping Board Claims Commission at $11,000 per annum, and at the same time is serving as the president of this private concern at Newport News, which has been given this contract amounting to something over $8,000,000 in the face, I repeat, of the expressed wish of Congress that the Government navy yards of this country be given an opportunity to do that work provided it could be done at less cost than it could be done at this private yard. I will not discuss the propriety of the Shipping Board making such a huge contract with one of the high salaried and influential employees of the board. Nor shall I do more than refer to the fact that thousands of employees are being turned out of Government navy yards because they have no work to do.

The Leviathan is going to be reconditioned at a cost of something like $8,000,000, or perhaps a little more than that, and I dare say that it will finally be sold for less than it will cost to recondition it. I do not vouch for the statement, but somebody told me that it would probably be sold for $6,000,000. Then, we are to be asked to pass a law giving a subsidy to whoever buys it in order to run and operate it.

Let me call your attention to another fact. If you will read the hearings on this independent office appropriation bill, you will find that the Shipping Board were there asking for authority of Congress, believing that it was necessary to obtain that authority to recondition this vessel. But they did not wait for the authority, when it appeared that Congress was about to pass the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], but they rushed out and made this contract with this private concern in order to forestall any act of Congress to compel this work to be done in a Government navy yard and by Government employees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would like two minutes more.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They quickly made this contract with a company the president of which is a member of the claims commission of the Shipping Board, and I understand they propose to pay for the reconditioning of the Leviathan out of that $55,000,000 which is to be derived from the sale of surplus material and ships.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMONDS. Is the gentleman sure that Mr. Ferguson is serving on that claims commission?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have been assured of that fact. I do not think there is any doubt about it. Mr. Lasker so stated on January 4 of this year, as appears on page 907 of the hearing.

Mr. EDMONDS. I know he was appointed on the commission, but I understand he refused to serve as long as he had any contract in view that his company was connected with.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If he is not on the board, he has resigned since he got this contract, because he has been serving on the board, according to express statements of Mr. Lasker.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman says he has been serving on the board?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is my understanding, and I think my information is correct, for it is based on the explicit statement of Mr. Lasker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had receded from its amendments numbered 26 and 27 to the bill (H. R. 10663) entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes," and that the Senate had concurred in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60 to said bill.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I agree with everything the gentleman from Tennessee has said. In my opinion, the action of the Shipping Board in this instance was assinine, dishonest, and contemptible. However, that is not the matter before us. The matter that I want to call to the attention of the House is this: Are we, the Members of the House, to be able to depend on the leadership of the House when they make promises to us in regard to conference reports? It is not a question of what was in this amendment; it is simply a question, Are we to depend on the leadership of the House to bring back conference reports when they say they will? I am not going to argue the question, but I will put into the RECORD just what was stated when this conference report was before the House, taken from the Journal of the House of February 27:

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman tell us whether the conferees are going to insist upon the House position in regard to the amendment providing that articles which can be produced or repaired cheaper in navy yards and arsenals shall be so produced and repaired?

I understand in the Senate a substitute for it was adopted which does not carry out the wishes of the House in any respect or in a very slight respect.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have always understood it to be the duty of the conferees to maintain and insist upon the position maintained by the House, and I do not think there will be any exception as far as this is concerned.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman agree to bring this back? It is a very important amendment and I think it is a reasonable request.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will agree with the gentleman that it is a very important amendment. I believe that the gentlemen who are the proponents of this amendment will now agree that the amendment carried and passed by the House would have been impossible; but, so far as I am one of the conferees, I will be glad to see that the wishes of the House are maintained and, if not, I will bring it back to the House.

Not a word of the House amendment is retained in the conference report. This is admitted.

He did not bring it back. He admits it. I do not think there is anything further that I can say, but I do suggest to the chairman of the committee that he himself make a motion to send it back to conference.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama three minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was up we had some controversy and argument in regard to the provision for the advertising appropriation in the Shipping Board, the amount that they were to spend for advertising. It developed in debate that as high as 15 per cent was paid for placing advertising contracts. After we had had considerable discussion, I offered an amendment, found on page 33 of the bill:

Provided, That no part of the sums hereinbefore appropriated shall be used to pay a greater sum than 5 per cent as commission for the placing of advertising matter contracted for.

When I offered that amendment the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], agreed to the amendment, and by that I assume that he agreed that it was a proper limitation to pay for advertising contracts. Now we find that the House conferees have receded and that has been stricken out of the bill. I would like if the gentleman from Indiana will tell us why the conferees agreed to that proposition. The House had accepted it and the gentleman had recognized the wisdom and justice of the amendment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will be glad to tell the gentleman. As far as the amount is concerned, it amounts to nothing, whether it was 15 per cent or 5 per cent that might be involved, or whatever per cent might be paid by the parties. The evidence showed that out of all of the advertising the Government had only paid $285, or in that neighborhood. The Senate, so we were informed—and I do not think I am revealing any secret—was induced to strike out that language upon the assumption that it was a reflection on Mr. Lasker, who happens to be engaged in that character of business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Lasker felt that it was a reflection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That was the purpose of the Senate to strike it out, and the conferees felt that as Mr. Lasker was sensitive about it and the amount involved was absolutely null, and as far as its being of real service it amounted to nothing, and that was the reason we accepted it at the time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think we are going pretty far afield when the naked declaration of a Government official that he feels that the deliberate action of this House undertaking to properly limit the expenditures of the department is a reflection on that official—that upon his mere suggestion the conferees should yield, notwithstanding the opinion of the House of Representatives?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the attack that was made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] on Mr. Ferguson is based upon his acceptance of the appointment as a member of the Compensation Claims Commission. I do not know whether Mr. Ferguson is discharging the duties of that position or not. I do know Mr. Ferguson personally; I have known him for a number of years. I do know that there is not in my acquaintance a man of a higher sense of honor or a higher regard for right than Mr. Ferguson.

Mr. BRYNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say that I made no attack on Mr. Ferguson. I was simply calling attention and submitting the question of propriety of the Shipping Board making an $8,000,000 contract with one of its high-priced employees. I made no attack on Mr. Ferguson; I am sure he is entitled to the high commendation given him by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Personally I can not see any incompatibility in his position as president of the shipyard and as a member of the Compensation Claims Commission. If the Compensation Claims Commission had anything to do with the award of the contract for the Leviathan to the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., the positions would be incompatible, but they occupy an entirely different position, and the Compensation Claims Commission had absolutely nothing to do with the award of the contract. It is utterly impossible for me to see just where the incompatibility arises.

I submit that there was a reason for the award of this contract on the early date on which it was awarded, a reason that has not been brought to the attention of this House. According to my understanding from the debates that occurred in the Senate—and I have not heard it denied—the bids that had been called for were limited to acceptance by February 15, as I recall the date. At any rate they were limited so that they became inoperative on the day succeeding the very day on which the Shipping Board awarded this contract. If the board had waited until the succeeding day, every private bidder could have recalled his bid and would not have been bound by it. In fact, some of the subcontractors, some of the people who had obligated themselves to the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., had already served notice on the company and on the Shipping Board that unless the contract was awarded on the date fixed, I think February 15, they would no longer be bound by their contracts. Therefore the operation of the provision inserted by the Congress, if carried into effect, would have been absolutely to strike down every offer that had been submitted by a private concern.

Mr. Speaker, the newspapers are fairly accurate in sensing public opinion, and if gentlemen will examine the editorials of the newspapers of this country, even from Boston itself, to the far South, they will find that there has been an indorsement of the action of the Shipping Board in awarding this contract to a private bidder. This question is not a new one in this Congress. The people who are connected with the Government have had some experience in this. In 1914 or 1915 the Government considered the award of the contracts for the Texas and the New York. The Texas was awarded to the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. and was constructed for about $5,830,000. One of the northern navy yards, I think the Brooklyn Navy Yard, insisted that it could build the sister ship at the same price. The result was the navy yard had to come back to this Congress for an additional appropriation of $400,000, and when completed a letter of the Secretary showed that the ship which was built in the navy yard cost this Government $1,125,000 more than the ship which was constructed in a private yard.

I submit that this was a proper business transaction on the part of the Shipping Board, especially in view of the fact that the offers would have expired by limitation on the day that the contract was let.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I have a letter here written to me by a representative constituent, which pertains to the efficiency of the advertising which has been spoken of to-day. That letter is as follows:

THE GREENWAY,
Baltimore, February 6, 1922.

Hon. J. CHAS. LINTHICUM,
20 East Lexington Street.

DEAR SIR: I should like to call attention to the inefficient manner of conducting business now employed by the United States Shipping Board. On January 1 I wrote to several transatlantic lines asking for information regarding rates, dates of sailing, etc. I received replies from all lines promptly except from the office of the United States Shipping Board, 45 Broadway, New York. After waiting for a reply for two weeks I answered an advertisement of the Shipping Board which appeared in one of the magazines requesting prospective travelers to send to information desk at Washington for information regarding sailings, etc. Ten days later I received a booklet giving information perhaps valuable to one who has never been abroad, regarding passport regulations, etc., but having nothing of value for the average experienced traveler. I was informed that my request for passage data had been forwarded to the New York offices. I am still waiting after nearly a month and a half of delay, for even an acknowledgment of my first letter to the New York office.

What is the use of indulging in wordy outbursts in regard to patriotically patronizing our own merchant marine, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars for advertising, and then allowing other more wideawake lines to walk away with the business for want of proper attention?

I should have liked to have patronized "our own ships," but I can not wait any longer.

Very truly, yours, RALPH C. WILLIAMS.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, this amendment was adopted by the House by almost a unanimous vote, and the same language, almost word for word, the House put into the permanent law in the Army reorganization act, and it is also contained in the military and the naval appropriation acts of last year. It simply provided that if any of this work could be done more cheaply in Government arsenals or navy yards it should be so done. When the conferees were appointed the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and myself, knowing that the Senate had adopted an amendment very much weaker than the House amendment, asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], reserving our right to object to the bill going to conference, if he would bring it back to the House if the Senate did not agree to the House position. He promised that he would. "I will bring it back to the House," he said on page 3110 of the RECORD. It seems to me that the conferees have not kept their promise. They have agreed to an amendment which not only weakens the House provision but even the Senate provision, increasing the limit as it does from $5,000 to $100,000, and the only thing that the House can do is to refuse to accept the conference report.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to read a letter which I have received from a very distinguished man. I ask this privilege because of the very severe attacks made in a recent debate here upon another man, not a Member of the House, who, therefore, had no opportunity to defend himself. I am not personally acquainted with the writer of the letter, but know, as do the other Members of the House, that he is a man of international reputation among the highest in his profession:

CASS GILBERT, ARCHITECT,
New York, February 14, 1922.

Hon. HENRY ALLEN COOPER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COOPER: I have read with much interest and satisfaction your recent speech in the House of Representatives on the subject of the Commission of Fine Arts, and of Mr. Charles Moore, its chairman. As a former member of the commission and as a citizen interested in the public welfare I wish to thank you for it.

I was one of the original members of the commission, and was appointed by President Taft. At the end of my term I was reappointed by President Wilson, and resigned in the autumn of 1916, after nearly six and a half years of active service. Since then I have kept in touch with the commission, and while I do not know its work in detail I do know that its general character has not changed. As Chief Justice Taft recently said to me, "It is the best commission in Washington."

I have seen a good deal of public service in the last 25 years, and I never have known a group of men more thoroughly unselfish and more imbued with the spirit of devotion to the public welfare than have been the men constituting the Commission of Fine Arts, and this applies with especial force to Mr. Charles Moore, its chairman. His services to the Government for nearly a quarter of a century have not only been singularly unselfish, but have been of the highest order, for they have led to direct constructive results. It was he who started Senator McMillan upon the water supply and filtration plant for the District of Columbia. He followed this up by calling Senator McMillan's attention to and urging upon him the trunk line sewer system for the city of Washington. He was one of those who had a part in securing the removal of the Pennsylvania Railroad tracks from the Mall. He was one of the early advocates of the saving of Rock Creek Valley. He has been a helpful advocate of the development of the park system of Washington. Modest, unselfish, and sincere, he has been an advocate of every good cause for the development of the National Capital within reasonable lines to my knowledge for more than 20 years, and he is a man of trained taste and scholarly attainment. His scholarship is recognized by his election to membership in the National Institute of Arts and Letters and various other professional societies. I think Charles Moore has the confidence of those engaged in arts and letters to a greater extent than any other man connected with the public service, and he has earned it and he has never misused it. It will be a public calamity and an irreparable loss when Mr. Moore ceases to be an active factor in the development of the District of Columbia.

During my time on the Commission of Fine Arts I think we had to pass on questions as varied as the design of a dollar bill to the planning of the city of Balboa in the Panama Canal Zone.

I remember a single instance in which the commission recommended the omission of an unnecessary colonnade on one of the proposed public buildings which, according to my estimate, reduced the cost $2,000,000. I cite this only as evidence of the commission's attitude toward such matters, which has been one of economy, common sense, and good taste.

I note that it has been said in Congress that the members of the commission have desired such appointments because of social prestige and because they received invitations to fetes and other occasions in Washington. My own experience does not bear this out.

In fact, I can recall many occasions when I had to give up important business, professional, and social engagements in New York and elsewhere, to attend meetings of the Commission of Fine Arts, and one of the reasons why I resigned from the commission was that I was giving so much time to the work which it involved that it constituted a serious interference with the professional work for which my clients paid me.

I trust you will pardon these personal allusions, but they seem not entirely out of place in view of the statements which seem to have been made by Members of Congress.

I did not start this letter as a defense of the Commission of Fine Arts, but only to thank you for your speech and the very appreciative expressions of the work which the commission and Mr. Moore have done.

With personal regards, I remain,
Faithfully, yours,
CASS GILBERT.

Mr. Gilbert is the architect of the Woolworth Building in New York City, of the Minnesota State capitol, and of other famous structures, and has been chosen by West Virginia to draft plans for her capitol. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] said that not even "a pigpen can be built in Washington without the consent of Mr. Moore." Now, the fact is that the order of President Harding specifically provides that the only buildings about which the commission is to be consulted for advice, and only for advice, are buildings constructed by the executive departments or by the District of Columbia. The order does not at all relate to private buildings, and anyone who knew the law would have said that instead of what was said.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention very briefly to what has been stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], which is of importance in the consideration of this report.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken in reference to the position occupied by Mr. Ferguson—an unintentional mistake, of course. Mr. Ferguson is the president, as I understand, of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. He was appointed by the President upon the claims commission of the Shipping Board; but Mr. Ferguson, because of the fact the company of which he is president has a claim against the Shipping Board, absolutely refused to accept that position, and does not occupy that position now.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I call the gentleman's attention to the hearing which was conducted on January 4 of this year, page 907, in which Mr. Lasker stated:

We got very high-grade men on it, the members of the commission being Judge Walter D. Neals, formerly justice of the appellate court of Ohio, who is the chairman of the commission; Mr. Arthur W. Peelle, of Patterson, Peelle & Dennis, and vice president of the American Institute of Accountants; Mr. Homer L. Ferguson, president of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co.; Capt. R. M. Watt, formerly chief constructor of the Navy; and Mr. F. W. Wood, of Baltimore, former president of the Maryland Steel Co.

Those were the members of the claims commission on January 4, according to the statement of Mr. Lasker.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state the board was constituted with their names, but Mr. Ferguson refused to accept. He is named as a member of this commission, but he refused to accept upon the high ground of the position he occupied in reference to this shipyard.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If that be true, why did Mr. Lasker make that statement? He made no statement in the hearings that Mr. Ferguson was not serving, but stated at that time he was a member of the claims commission.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that Mr. Lasker was speaking in general terms about the people occupying this position, and in order that there might be no mistake about this thing I have just this minute, through the Clerk and Mr. WASON, had a conversation with the Shipping Board, and they tell me what I now tell you as being the latest information, that while he was appointed he refused to accept for the reason I have stated and he has never drawn a penny.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, of course my statement was based upon the emphatic statement of Mr. Lasker. Now, if Members of Congress can not rely upon the hearings which were had before the committee and which were afterwards looked over and revised before being printed in order to prevent any mistake being made, I do not know what Congress can rely upon.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state that Mr. Lasker in stating the men who had been selected for these various positions named Mr. Ferguson——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But he did not make that statement, I submit to the gentleman, but named the men who had been appointed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman will just let me proceed. Mr. Lasker was making a general statement in reference to the personnel occupying the various positions connected with this board and named Mr. Ferguson among them. I can see very readily how the gentleman from Tennessee could have been misled by the language, and I confess I would have been misled also. To be exactly right about the thing, the Shipping Board was called up and the statement was as I have given it, that he was not appointed for the reason I stated and he has never drawn a cent, and in the event he had I appreciate the high-mindedness in not accepting it because of the very insinuations that might be made by reason of his connections in any capacity. But that would have nothing to do with the letting of the contract for the Leviathan, and that had nothing to do with the claims commission whatever; but he did not desire to place himself in a position where he might be criticized.

Now, much has been said here about the haste with which this contract for reconditioning the Leviathan was let. It either had to be let upon the very day that it was finally let or else new bids had, and it can not truthfully be said they took advantage of any situation. My attention has been called, and I call attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to this same hearing, on page 1075 of the hearings of the subcommittee in the second paragraph, where it mentions Mr. Homer Ferguson, of the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., and it says:

The latter gentleman has not qualified or acted with the commission.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Who made that statement?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is on a different day or a different statement.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It was made afterwards. That is true, but——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Who made the statement—Mr. Lasker?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Lasker or some one of his agents. Now, gentlemen, because the Shipping Board is unpleasant and all of its transactions have been nauseating and disgusting prior to this administration to everybody who has any connection with it at all we should not be unmindful of the fact that the United States is vitally interested in the concerns of this Shipping Board.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just one moment. That statement which the gentleman read in response to some gentleman's question on the floor was made by Mr. Bullitt, not Mr. Lasker.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I believe it was made by Mr. Bullitt; I did not look the testimony over. But why quibble about this thing, except for the purpose of exciting the prejudice of men already aroused beyond the point they should be aroused? I have no more concern in this matter than anybody else has, unless it be because of the position I occupy. I tried to get the facts and be fair with this committee. I confess when I commenced this investigation I was prejudiced not only against the old Shipping Board but against the present one, and I think if you will read these hearings you will find the questions I propounded indicated this fact, but I was convinced, before we got through this thing, by reason of the testimony that could not be questioned or disputed, that these men were trying to bring some order out of the most chaotic conditions. Amongst other things, they had conceived the idea of reconditioning this Leviathan, and they had asked for bids from everybody that wanted to bid. Bids came even from Germany, and they were for a less amount than the bid finally accepted of the Newport News Co., but knowing the great wrath that would be stirred up, and justifiably so, perhaps, if they were to let this contract abroad, even though it did save a great amount of money to the United States, they were justified in refusing any foreign bids, and they finally let it to the Newport News Co. on the last day, when that company was trying to get out of it. That is what they did for the purpose of saving money to the United States.

Now, as to the amendment, that whole thing was predicated on the reconditioning of the Leviathan, and I have no idea, if they had it not in mind, that it would have found any place in this consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to direct an inquiry to the gentleman as to the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER]. They charged the chairman with not keeping faith with the House. I would like to know if that is true, if the gentleman has not already made a statement in regard to it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I made that statement awhile ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I did not hear it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There were two days when this bill was up for the purpose of referring it to the conference. On the first day there was a colloquy between the gentleman from Iowa and myself, and the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself. Nothing was done upon that day. Something was said then with reference to this amendment, I contending that it would be absolutely impossible to carry out the amendment that was offered, and that we should insist as nearly as possible in trying to find out, and, so far as I was concerned, I was willing to let it come back to the House. On the second day, or the next day thereafter, we did bring it back, and there was some objection from the gentleman from Tennessee. We did bring it back on the others. As I said before, by reason of the confusion I overlooked it. I do not want to be placed in the attitude of breaking my faith with anybody connected with the House. It is very easy for the gentlemen to refuse this conference report and to send it back. But I want to say now, if there is a fair-minded man before me, he can read this amendment with reference to having the work done in the navy yards, and he would know that you could not repair these ships there, for you could not get a bid for doing the work in the navy yards. There is some reason why this thing should be finally entirely rejected or else adopted, not so much with reference to the Shipping Board but with reference to other material matters on which options are now pending, but which will expire to-day. We did it so far as this amendment is concerned, and on the part of the House we inserted in the Senate amendment the inclusion of arsenals that was not included in the Senate amendment.

I want to call attention, and this is one of the many examples that might be cited, to the fact of how impossible it is to carry out the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER]. Under the law the Shipping Board is required to carry a certain per cent of the immigrants that come into this country. In order to do that thing they had to recondition their vessels in order to provide satisfactory space for these passengers. Now, if we would carry out the proposals submitted and get estimates from the navy yards, and some limitation was not placed upon them, and we placed on it $100,000 in improvements, it would require much time to recondition. Under the policy adopted by the Shipping Board they take a crew of ship carpenters aboard the vessel with the material, and they go abroad to where these immigrants are collected, and they recondition the boat on the way over there. The boat is sailing all the time and does not lose any time by that arrangement, and they get the work done on a ship, according to the evidence submitted by those in charge, much more easily than if they would tie it up while the work was being done. Besides, the vessel is in movement all the while. That is just one thing, and it requires in some of these boats $60,000 or $75,000 to put them in condition to do that work.

Mr. HULL. On the second day that the gentleman speaks of, that he brought this conference report before the House, was there anything at all said about this particular amendment?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely. I said in the colloquy, if you will read it there, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts was impossible and that no fair-minded man could read it, in view of the necessity of the Shipping Board, and be in favor of it.

Mr. HULL. That was the first day.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. On the last day there was nothing at all said about the amendment.

Mr. HULL. Was there anything said?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

Mr. HULL. You promised to bring back this report with the House amendment as suggested, and you did not bring it back.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely. And I say it would be a waste of time, and absolutely a useless performance. It is up to you gentlemen to determine whether or not we have served you as best we could; and if you think we have not, why, reject this report.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves the previous question on agreeing to the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. DALLINGER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. DALLINGER. To make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HICKS. In case there is no quorum present would that require an automatic roll call?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks there would not be an automatic roll call. The Chair waited before announcing the result.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his point of order. The Clerk will report the first amendment disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 2, page 3, line 4: After the word "traveling" insert "and official entertainment."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment numbered 2.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me three minutes?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think the House ought to insist on its disagreement to this amendment. Of course, it seems in a way somewhat ungracious to resist a matter of this sort, and yet it involves a principle which I do not think the Congress ought to commit itself to. I do not understand that the President has ever requested it, and consequently nothing that I am saying can be taken as any sort of reflection on the President. It has never been the policy of this Government to appropriate money for entertainment and social purposes. It ought not to be the policy.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Has not Congress appropriated money for the State Department for that very purpose?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not recall it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, we have, for the entertainment of foreign visitors.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not recall even that, but I will take the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps it was for their own details.

Mr. MONDELL. What about the expenditures in Paris during the negotiation of the treaty of Versailles? Was there not a very considerable amount of entertainment at very considerable cost at Government expense?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know. There was a sum appropriated, of course, to the commissioners, and the commissioners were headed by the President of the United States. How he spent the money I do not know.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman has heard rumors?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Here is the situation: We might just as well be perfectly frank about the matter. Custom has imposed upon the President of the United States the unpleasant burden of having about four public receptions a year. I imagine it is very unpleasant to all the Presidents; I do not know. There is not any obligation on the part of the President to feed the folks that go there. The present President has not been doing it, and I glory in his spunk in not doing it. [Applause.] But I do not think that the Congress ought to appropriate money to pay for food at entertainments up there. That is all there is about it, and that is all I have to say about it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think these receptions had better be cut out altogether rather than to tax the people who have not the opportunity to attend?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; I think so. They are a nuisance to everybody.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There has been for many years an appropriation of $25,000 for traveling expenses of the President. That item has been used for all expenses of traveling, including, of course, the expenses of entertainment while traveling, but there is some question as to whether that is authorized by the language of the appropriation. To make it clear that this item is available for official entertainment, for which it has been used, at least when the President is traveling, the language is inserted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment No. 2.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is called for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 34.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is evident that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recede and concur. Those in favor of the motion will signify their assent by answering "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 220, nays 96, answered "present" 2, not voting 110, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The yeas have it, and the motion to recede and concur is agreed to. The Clerk will report the next amendment still in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 19: Page 11, line 6, after the figures "11" insert: "and advancement of costs for the enforcement of recoveries provided in sections 26 and 27 where necessary, and not exceeding $25 in any one case."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment 19.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment 19.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 21: Page 12, beginning with line 4, strike out the remainder of page 12 and all of page 13, down to and including line 14, and insert the following:

"For carrying out the provisions of the act of June 10, 1921, establishing the General Accounting Office, including salaries of officers and employees, traveling expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence while absent on official business outside the District of Columbia not to exceed $50,000, rent, purchase, and exchange of books, and contingent and miscellaneous expenses, $2,496,101."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I move that the House recede and concur in amendment numbered 21 with the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana offers a motion, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOOD of Indiana moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 21 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the sum of "$2,496,101" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$2,468,601."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of that amendment is to correct a mistake made by the Senate in their calculation as to the amount required.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I should like to have some time on this amendment. I should like five minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have a very high personal regard for my friend the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], as well as a very great respect for his ability. We generally agree upon matters of appropriations; but I am very much opposed to the motion which he has just made. If his motion prevails, its effect will be to place in a lump sum in the hands of the Comptroller General of the United States the sum of $2,468,000 for the payment of salaries and the other expenses of the General Accounting Office. That is something that is not done for any other department or bureau, save a very few such as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission, where they employ men frequently for temporary periods of a few months—investigators, and so forth. This is a departure from the uniform custom and practice of Congress not to place lump sums in the hands of the heads of departments or bureaus for the purpose of paying salaries.

In addition to that, this bureau under the Budget law is peculiarly a bureau of Congress. It is not attached to any department of this Government but it is under the jurisdiction of Congress itself under the Budget law. Now, why should we take this initial step in behalf of a bureau under Congress when we uniformly and properly decline to do so for the executive departments of this Government? When the law was passed last year it made available for the Comptroller General of the United States the employees and the appropriations which were made for the various auditors in the different departments of this Government, amounting to $2,152,613.57. Let me call your attention to the fact that that was not a lump sum. The employees so transferred were on the statutory roll, and they are now on the statutory roll in the Comptroller General's office. But if the motion of the gentleman from Indiana prevails they will be taken off the statutory roll and it will be left to the Comptroller General to fix their salaries at whatsoever amount he may choose within the maximum limitation fixed by the Budget law of $5,000. Now, are we going to do that? Are we going to take that radical and unusual step with reference to this particular office, or are we going to treat this office as we treat all the offices of this Government and have a voice as to what shall be paid to the employees of that particular office?

My friends, there is nothing personal about this. It is not because it is the office of the Comptroller General. If it was any other office, my position would be the same. I am opposed to lump sums. Whenever you undertake to appropriate lump sums you may expect extravagance and favoritism. Pressure will be brought upon those having charge of that lump sum, and whatever may be their intention you will have charges of favoritism and you will find extravagance before the appropriation has been fully expended. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. Does the law provide a maximum number of employees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. LONDON. Does it provide a maximum salary that may be paid to any employee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The law provides that there shall not be exceeding the number of six, I believe, who shall be paid a salary exceeding $5,000; but there is no limitation on the head of this office under the sum of $5,000, and with that as a maximum he may fix whatever salaries he pleases if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is the gentleman a conferee on this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I am not.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know what arguments are advanced for substituting this lump-sum appropriation for the itemized bill as it was?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will recall that when the bill was reported in the House from the Committee on Appropriations it carried a lump sum, but by action of the House by an overwhelming vote the employees in this office were placed upon a statutory basis. Then it went to the Senate and the Senate struck out the provision of the House and put back the lump sum.

I do not question the good faith of the Comptroller General or any of his assistants. I do not question their sincerity, but I do want to say that the record made by the office is not one that would appeal to you from the standpoint of economy. When the Budget law was passed it was said that it would save 600 employees in the various auditors' offices of the department, and yet we have a situation where this office had for this year $2,150,000 for employees on the statutory roll, and, as was said this morning by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], chairman of the Appropriations Committee, in the consideration of the conference report on the deficiency bill, this bill carries $341,617.43 more for next year than was had for the current year. If the House conferees on the deficiency appropriation bill had been willing to agree to the $350,000 for 1923, which was placed on that bill by the Senate at the request of the Comptroller General, it would have made an appropriation of $691,000 more for the next year than was appropriated for this year. They said $350,000 would enable them to employ 253 more persons; therefore the $341,617.43 additional carried in this bill will enable them to employ in the neighborhood of 250 more employees next year than they had this year. So I say, my friends, you can not fully rely on the economy of that office, although it ought to set the example for economy. And in the face of that record I insist that we should not put this immense sum in their hands without limitations as to salaries or the number to be employed. I hope that the House will vote down this motion and insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate in placing this lump sum in their hands. I hope that you will show no partiality for this office because it happens to be under the direct jurisdiction and supervision of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS. May I ask whether the lump sum of $2,496,000 is less than the total amount stricken out in the bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not tell; I think it is the same amount.

Mr. STEPHENS. It is not any more?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think it is more; I think it is the same. In the bill the employees are put on a statutory basis and in this amendment a lump sum is provided.

Mr. STEPHENS. If the lump sum was less there would be some merit in the proposition.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; but there is another thing. This provision of the House fixes the salaries and the number of employees. The Comptroller General told the Appropriations Committee that he was going to employ them and the House provision takes care of that exact number. It does not take from or add to the salary of a single employee that the Comptroller General told the committee and Congress through the committee that he was going to employ if this money was allowed him. What objection, therefore, can he have to the House provision, and how can it hinder his office in any way?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the argument in favor of this proposed change by the Senate amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know; that will have to come from others. So far as I am concerned, I can not see any reasonable argument in favor of it. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have known no exception where the head of a bureau or department did not insist in advance that he could run his bureau or department for less money with a lump-sum appropriation than he could with a specific appropriation, defining the places. I have known no exception where a lump-sum appropriation was granted that it did not result in extravagance and waste of money. [Applause.] We would not be disputing about the high salaries in the Shipping Board if they had not started under a lump-sum appropriation. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] just instanced the Federal Trade Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission as bodies which properly receive lump-sum appropriations, and yet everyone familiar with the work of either the Federal Trade Commission or the Interstate Commerce Commission knows that the salaries paid by those bodies far exceed the average salary for similar work in other branches of the Government. [Applause.] It is human nature, and there is no use in discounting human nature. The man at the head of a bureau with a large sum of money at his control will grant salaries and promotions which he easily turns down when he does not have the authority. Now, here is a General Accounting Office, a new scheme to secure economy in the Government, a new method for cutting off expenses of the Government. If there is any bureau of the Government that ought to be willing to come under the well-recognized principles settled by Congress in regard to appropriations, this new bureau ought to do it. The amendment, which was inserted by the House on the floor when the bill was under consideration, put in all the places that they said they wanted. They do not have to keep them; if the comptroller can practice economy he does not have to employ them all. There is nothing compulsory about giving employment to this number of people; he can cut them off if he wants to practice economy. But if he gets a lump-sum appropriation and it remains from year to year the inevitable result, based not only on human nature but upon actual experience, is high salaries and poor and inefficient work. I hope the House will retain the position it took and insist on the provision it inserted in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and also with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] with reference to the evil practice under lump-sum appropriations, and I expect I have had about as much experience in observing that abuse as anybody. If we are to be consistent in this matter, however, the gentleman from Tennessee or some one else should propose to apply the statutory rules on fixing salaries to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Housing Corporation, and some dozens of others.

Why this particular office was singled out I do not know, but I propose, if I can, to point out to you some reason, at least, why this lump-sum appropriation should be granted for the next year. I have before me a letter written by the assistant comptroller in which he says, and he so informed the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], as I understand it, in an interview that he had with him, that that office is perfectly willing to obligate itself in writing, as they have done in this letter, that never again will they ask for a lump-sum appropriation. They deprecate the lump-sum appropriation. The purposes in asking it at this time are as follows: As has been stated here, this is a new activity, and it is in a state of reorganization. All of the auditors of the various branches of the Government are now combined under the comptroller and under the direction of the comptroller. There are 15 of these different offices scattered around all over the city, employing some 1,400 or 1,600 auditors and their clerks. In this process of reorganization they have already weeded out many who are inefficient and have reduced some to a lower grade and in a few instances have granted promotions. While this organizing process is going on, if you fix these statutory salaries you are tying the hands of the comptroller, who is trying as best he can in the next year to find out the positions and those occupying them who are entitled to this, that, or the other salary. If you fix them, his hands are tied to a very considerable degree.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. On the other hand, is it not true that if we give the comptroller one year of lump-sum appropriation, and he fixes these salaries at an overly high figure, our hands are tied and we can never reduce them?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely not, because salaries fixed by the heads of these bureaus have no sanction in law. We do not know now what they are paying except as the statement which was submitted by this gentleman shows, and the statement submitted by the comptroller was the basis on which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] fixed his amendment. I am informed that they have already reduced a number of clerks because of the fact that they found them inefficient, and they are holding this out as an incentive to those employees down there. They are saying that if they prove within the next year that they are entitled to this, that, or the other salary they will get it, but that they must show it by their work and not by a salary being fixed by Congress. I want to read a line or two from this letter:

> In the absence of Mr. McCarl, I hope, for him as well as for myself, that we may have the lump-sum appropriation again next year in the interest of economical administration of the General Accounting Office. We will save money to the Government if we can have that, because certainly this office (more perhaps than any other) should be and will be interested in governmental economies. I believe that those of you who know this office will readily agree with this.
> As a direct agency of Congress and subject to its immediate supervision, I think it should always be considered that the office would want to be on the side of least possible criticism, which would not be the case if we permitted the office to run wild in the matter of increase of salaries.

As I stated a while ago, Mr. McCarl knows the abuse of this thing, and I have seen it repeated so often that I am heartily sick of the lump-sum appropriation. We have been waiting and hoping against hope that a reclassification bill would come in whereby these salaries would be adjusted and permanently fixed. Because of the fact that this is a new organization, the machinery just being adjusted, and because of the fact that in the opinion of the general accounting officer—and I think his opinion is worth while—money can be saved to the Treasury by readjusting these places and fixing these salaries according to merit and demerit, we should give him this one year's appropriation with the pledge that never again will they ask for it and that they will save money out of this appropriation.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In a conversation with Mr. Ginn he told me that the purpose was to secure better discipline and not to increase the amount. He assured me that the amount would be decreased rather than increased, and so far as Mr. McCarl is concerned this House knows that he has been in the campaign for economy, and if any man in or out of Congress feels responsibility for economy it certainly is the man who is at the head of the Comptroller General's office. For that reason I I felt that it was in the interest of economy to grant the lump sum, although I have always been opposed to the idea of a lump sum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If it be true that it is in the interest of economy, why is it that the Comptroller General, who, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said, should stand for economy under the Budget law, is asking for $691,000 more for next year than he had this year, or an increase of over 25 per cent?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will tell the gentleman why: The fact is that in the attempt of the comptroller to reduce the expenditures, and without knowing fully the additional work that was going to be imposed on him, he diminished his force, perhaps, greater than he should. This is what has happened, and this is the reason why this additional appropriation is asked. There can not be a complete soldier's record file without going to the comptroller's office. There are papers lodged in the basement of Poli's Theater and a half dozen other basements that must be protected and preserved within the next year or else they will be forever lost to the Government. That is one of the reasons. That work can be done by cheap labor, not the high-class labor that is paid these higher salaries. If we will give him a little leeway he will do this work a great deal more cheaply than if we fixed the salaries that must be paid to these people who will do this work. He proposes to say to them, "If you do so much in a month, your salary will be thus and so, and if you produce a greater amount than that in a month, your salary will be increased in proportion." There will be some incentive held out; and this very additional appropriation that is asked for is for the purpose of doing this work, temporary in character, and it should be done under the supervision and direction of Mr. McCarl, who will, as I said, get the greatest amount of work for the least amount of pay.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman himself was the very able chairman of the committee which had charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I am quite sure that he had numerous requests, as chairman of that committee to place bureaus, offices, and activities on a lump-sum basis. I want to ask the gentleman if the statement was not uniformly made and the reason was not in every instance that they would save money if he would give them a lump sum, and if the gentleman did not uniformly decline to grant the request?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman is correct, and I say yet I am opposed to it, and but for the importance of this I would not yield in this instance. I believe Mr. McCarl—and the evidence shows the fact—has cut off 82 clerks within a very short time after he entered office, which showed his inclination and desire in relation to practicing economy. There is an immense volume of this old trumpery in the basement that must be preserved, and he is going to relieve this situation with the character of labor necessary, but not the high-class labor, not the labor employed under high salaries as we fix them. If you give him this lump-sum appropriation, he will show you at the end of the year that he has saved money, and we will not save any by putting them on fixed salaries, because those people will draw that salary and do as little work as possible to be able to get the pay, without any incentive to do more and without any fear of a discharge. So I say, gentlemen, we had better take the judgment and advice of this man, who has this thing at heart and who is charged with this responsibility, and who claims that he knows and says that if we will give it to him this year he will really save us money. It would be really refreshing to find one bureau of this Government that is saving money through a reduction of clerical hire. So let us give him a chance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion to recede and concur with the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana) there were—ayes 21, noes 89.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The commission in charge of the State, War, and Navy Departments Buildings, to wit, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, is hereby authorized and directed to acquire by purchase, so far as they may be able to at prices deemed by them to be reasonable and fair, otherwise by condemnation in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, providing for a site for the enlargement of the Government Printing Office, the following squares of land for public purposes, to wit, the whole of squares known as numbers east of 87, east of 88, 124, 125, 145, 146, and 147, in the city of Washington, D. C., as officially recorded in the office of the surveyor, District of Columbia. The commission is further authorized to reduce the area to be acquired where by reason of improvements constructed, or unreasonable prices asked, or for other reasons in their judgment the public interests may require: Provided, That if acquired by purchase, the cost of the squares, including expenses incident thereto, shall not exceed the sum of $1,500,000, which sum is hereby authorized and the same is hereby appropriated: Provided further, That the squares authorized to be acquired herein shall be under the control of the Superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Departments Buildings."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOOD of Indiana moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 24 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "appropriated," insert the following: "and made immediately available."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I wish to call attention to this item because of the fact that it involves an addition to this bill. This amendment inserted by the Senate, if adopted, means the purchase of a number of tracts of ground, seven in number, that lie immediately to the west of the Army and Navy Building, which were built on the Mall during the period of the war. Some of those options expire to-day. Col. Sherrill, who is Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, informs me that unless there is affirmative action taken to-day that it would result in a loss to the Government of some $200,000 because of the expiration of these options and their not being able to secure as good options again. Now as to the merits of this case. Senator SMOOT, who is at the head of the distribution of offices, perhaps is better informed in reference to the necessities of the Government and its official housing than anybody connected with either branch of this Government. He tells us of a number of rented buildings that we now have and upon which we are paying an exorbitant rate where notice has been served that unless additional rentals are paid that we must vacate those buildings. The most striking example is that occupied by the Department of Justice. A number of those buildings, or most of them, I think, down there are erected upon rented ground, and the term of those rentals is now expiring. These buildings that are included within this proposed purchase are of a somewhat permanent character, and the estimate has been made as to the probable life of those buildings with ordinary repair, and in the opinion of gentlemen who have made these surveys with ordinary care they will last for a period of 15 years. It has been the observation of the commission that we will save at least $800,000 a year if this purchase is made in comparison with what we will have to pay in rentals if the purchase is not made. This proposed purchase will involve an expenditure of $1,500,000 upon the assumption that the gentlemen are right in reference to the rental. We will save within two years more than the amount of the original cost of this ground.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman be a little more explicit as to where these buildings are located?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will read a statement here that was prepared that will give the gentleman that information. I will say that there was a resolution introduced in the Senate, and is now pending there, for the purpose of doing the very thing proposed by this amendment and upon which this statement of fact was prepared.

This statement is as follows:

The ground which it is contemplated to acquire through the operation of this resolution is at present the site of seven temporary buildings constructed during the war. The annual rental, plus taxes, which it is required to pay in some cases, amounts to $58,020.10. The leases on this land were made early in the war at prices which were very favorable from the point of view of the Government. A number of the leases expire this year; some contain renewal clauses, others do not. If it comes to renewing these leases it is anticipated that there will be a considerable increase demanded by the owners, due to the fact that the values in this section have increased materially owing to the presence of governmental activities. The seven buildings mentioned above comprise a net office area of 598,598 square feet, and the cost of construction was $2,029,559.14. The leases provide that at their expiration the buildings will be torn down and the ground returned to the owners in good condition. When this ground is turned back some of the owners will have a just claim against the Government for buildings which were torn down to make room for the temporary war buildings. It will probably cost the Government a considerable sum to remove the buildings and fix up the grounds so that they will be acceptable to the owners, because the buildings will have very little salvage value due to the drop in the cost of materials. In addition it will be necessary to furnish office space for the activities which now fill all of the available space in these buildings. It is estimated that the annual floor rent to take care of these activities would cost at least 75 cents per square foot, or approximately $500,000 per year, or one-third the cost of the land. In other words, three years' rental in private buildings would pay for the ground. If the ground is acquired the present buildings will last for a considerable period of years with proper maintenance, and will eventually afford space for the erection of permanent accommodations for the executive departments. Seventy per cent of the land which it is contemplated acquiring can be purchased now at private sale at an average price of $2.20 per square foot. It is not believed that the prices demanded for this property are exorbitant. Attention is invited to the fact that the ground occupied by the Interior Building cost $2 per square foot in 1903. The ground where the Red Cross Building is located cost $2 per square foot in about 1914. The grounds where it is contemplated erecting the new Convention Hall is costing about $4 per square foot. If purchased now it is believed that the Government could dispose of their holdings in these seven squares in case the land is not needed at a very substantial profit.

Mr. SNELL. But it does not say just where these buildings are located?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have a chart here which shows it exactly.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield? What are the conditions of the lease; do we have to restore the property as we found it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. So we have to take the buildings off and clean it up?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; that is right. I have before me a chart showing where these buildings are located and I will say that four of these tracts of ground are immediately north and west of Virginia Avenue, and the remaining three are immediately south and west.

Mr. SNELL. What activities of the Government are stationed in those buildings at the present time?

Mr. BUTLER. Do we need that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We absolutely need that. I can not say offhand what activities are down there, but I am assured by Senator SMOOT that all of this space, and more, is imperatively needed.

The buildings are all being occupied and I will state to the gentleman that there is a very great necessity for all of them, and we are simply being crucified by these profiteers that are holding these other buildings, because they think that we will be forced to renew their leases rather than to go into these temporary buildings, and there is the further fact that the ground leases will all have expired within a very few months, and the buildings will be razed to the ground, and these activities that are now there will have to find housing somewhere else.

Mr. SNELL. Is not there an idea that some of these buildings——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There was an idea that the War and Navy Buildings would serve for the overflow that would be essential for 10 years after the close of the war. But in my opinion these activities have so increased that they will run longer than that. We are simply turning out new activities here every Congress.

Mr. SNELL. It would appear to the average citizen who walks down through that neighborhood that there is a lot of waste space there.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am not a member of the commission that has the allotment of floor space. Senator SMOOT is chairman of it, and I think those who know that gentleman think that he is trying his level best to try to cut down the activities of the Government and reduce the space the Government is occupying, especially in rented buildings.

Mr. SNELL. If we did not have any place to put them, maybe some time we could end them.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We will have to put them somewhere. Now, we have got a temporary provision to take care of them ourselves, but we must make arrangements for their more permanent housing.

Mr. SNELL. And how are you going to save the amount that you stated per year?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is shown that as compared with the rentals we are now paying and the additional rentals we will have to pay if the houses are removed, we will save money by keeping them through this purchase.

Mr. SNELL. That takes it for granted that we are going to continue the activities right along. As a matter of fact, are we going to do it? It seems to me it is time to stop.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is an easy thing to say, but when it comes to doing it it is quite another proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. We have certain buildings upon leased ground and we can buy that ground at a fair market value, and we must have floor space. If we do not go into these buildings upon leased ground, we will have to go elsewhere in order to get it. We will not lose any money by buying the ground, will we?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In the opinion of the gentlemen who have had this right under their supervision, they think it is a good investment, although the Government afterwards disposes of them.

Mr. SNELL. What is the price per foot?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Two dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. Can the gentleman tell how much money we will save, if we buy the ground, beyond that which we will have to pay if driven elsewhere?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In rentals, $500,000.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. SEARS. I understand there has been no hearing on this proposition before the House or the Senate?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Not before the Committee on Appropriations but before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SEARS. Who prepared the statement just read?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Senator SMOOT.

Mr. SEARS. Does not the gentleman believe that we should have hearings before we accept it, when we have lands all over the city?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That might seem advisable, but we are going to pay $200,000 by exercising the present option.

Mr. SEARS. On B Street we tore down some good buildings last year and are now tearing down some good buildings all over the city. Why not move these quarters into the buildings instead of tearing them down? I understand——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We did tear them down.

Mr. SEARS. Those buildings were torn down where the tennis courts are now located.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Where is this land located? Is it north of the new Army and Navy Building?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Just across the street?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. How many years ago was it—my recollection is that it is about 20—that we paid high prices for the land south of the Willard Hotel and west of the District Building, and near the ground that is south of the White House. I recollect we purchased all that. In fact, I do not know but I helped pass the bill to buy it. They were going to erect a State Department Building, and all kinds of buildings. Why not tear down those buildings? Poli's Theater is on one of the properties, as is a hotel. Why do you not tear down those buildings and cover the ground by real buildings instead of buying more ground?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that the information that was brought to the attention of your committee, and also to the attention of the conferees, was with reference to the necessity for our immediate relief, without regard to what our future necessities may be in reference to our erecting permanent buildings. I hope they will come some time; I hope they will; I think as a money-saving proposition we can save the Government money by making these purchases and occupying these buildings, with such repairs as may be necessary.

Mr. BUTLER. Can we renew these leases? The leases have expired, as I understand.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The statement says that we can not without paying largely additional prices.

Mr. PADGETT. Are not the buildings of which you speak of a very cheap and of a very temporary character, and are not a few of them now showing evidence of disintegration, and will they not have to be torn down, or will they not fall down, within the next few years?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that they have had a survey made of them, and that with ordinary repairs these buildings will answer the purpose of the Government for 15 years. They are the more permanent of the temporary buildings.

Mr. PADGETT. All these buildings, in the outside appearance, look like very cheap and very temporary structures. Now, is not that land located in the section of the city where land is very cheap? Is not that price of $1,500,000 out of all proportion to the value of the land expected to be acquired?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have already given you the statement as to the price of the land in that neighborhood. What was paid for the site of Continental Hall is a good sample.

Mr. PADGETT. But what has been paid elsewhere is not a true standard or criterion of the value of land in those localities. These other buildings are in an undeveloped part of the city.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. It has been stated that there are some governmental activities that will be or ought to be abandoned. Does the gentleman know of any governmental activities that are likely to be abandoned in the near future?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Not if those who are at the head of them are consulted.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I think some one in authority should be asked to submit a schedule of those activities. Whoever it is who thinks they should be abandoned ought to submit a schedule of them, so that we can have a working schedule here.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that the average Congressman has not the slightest idea of the manner in which our Government property is managed. I will cite one instance, with reference to the custody of the papers and files and records belonging to the Treasury Department. Those papers are scattered in 15 different buildings throughout the city. If a fire occurred there is no telling what the loss would be.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. If this is such a desirable economy, and a matter that could be adjusted at once, why did not the gentleman's committee bring it in when the other bill was under consideration, instead of bringing it up at this time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It was introduced as an independent bill in the Senate. Our committee did not have anything to do with it. The exigency is occasioned by the fact that these options expire soon—some of them expiring at midnight to-night—and it is for the Congress to determine whether it is wise to take the chance or not.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Suppose they do expire to-night. They can not eject us. We shall only have to pay rental. Is not that the case?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I say the options expire to-night.

Mr. BUTLER. It is the options?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and Col. Ridley says it will entail a loss to the Government of $200,000, assuming that we fail to buy it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I wish to ask the gentleman as to the situation respecting the leases. The leases are about to expire?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and we are under contract to remove the buildings and place the ground in as good a condition as it was when we took it over.

Mr. MANN. Will the leases be reduced if we do not buy the land?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If we do not buy the land, I am informed that they refuse to rerent them to the Government except at a largely increased rental.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Have these departments funds or power with which to make new leases?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not think so, because the terms of the leases provide that they shall be renewed when they expire. If they do not get the authority to extend them, I do not think they can rent them. These leases were made by the War Department and the Navy Department and other departments. I have not examined them, but my information is that they provide that they shall automatically expire at a certain time after the close of the war, with the condition annexed that the ground shall be placed in as good condition as it was before, and the owners are insisting that that contract shall be carried out. In the meantime somebody acting as the agent of the Government, without their knowing that it was the Government acting, got options on this ground for the Government. Now, it is contended that if we do not avail ourselves of the opportunity to renew them within the time specified—and some of them expire to-night—they will not renew them.

Mr. MANN. Are the buildings filled with governmental activities which will require space?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Every one of them. That is the trouble. The committee that has been according space to the various activities of the Government has been having trouble in providing necessary space in buildings of our own. These activities must be housed in some rented building somewhere else.

Mr. MANN. I have an impression that I have seen somewhere in some Government report in connection with this matter the statement that the cost of leases of space required in one year amounts to about one-third of the cost of the land. Is that correct?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; that is correct. That is set forth in this statement.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. The Government, as I understand it, leased the land from these owners?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Then it constructed the buildings that stand thereon?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Since that time an option has been taken on the land in favor of the Government?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The Government can buy it. Those leases are about to expire. The buildings are on the land. Has the gentleman any fear that if this proposition is not acted upon to-day the Government will be held up for a high rental, when, as a matter of fact, no one else can occupy those buildings except the Government?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; that is the reason; that is the trouble. If the buildings are torn down, it will of necessity force these people into other buildings.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. The gentleman has told us that some of the options expire to-night. It is manifest that this bill can not become a law immediately. I was wondering how we can take advantage of the situation and exercise the option now, since the law can not be passed within the time limit.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have the assurance of Col. Sherrill that if we approve this provision he will close these options, the Senate already having ratified it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SEARS) there were—ayes 49, noes 30.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-one Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absentees. The question is on the motion to recede and concur with an amendment. Those in favor will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 133, nays 180 answered "present" 3, not voting 112, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment numbered 29: Page 30, line 8, strike out the figures "$300,000" and insert "$375,000."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House still further insist on its disagreement to this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House still further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 29.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 31: Page 32, line 22, after the word "ships," insert the following: "and (d) $55,000,000 from moneys collected from mortgages, leases, accounts and bills receivable other than those arising from current operations, and from moneys collected from the sale of ships, plants, material, securities, and other assets prior to July 1, 1923, less such portion of said $55,000,000 which shall have been collected during the fiscal year 1922 under the provisions of an act entitled 'An act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes,' approved March 4, 1921."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Would it not be well for the gentleman to explain this amendment and tell us how much it will increase the appropriation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the language put in by the Senate is the exact language that appeared in the bill when it was presented to the House, but which went out on a point of order. This exact language was contained in the bill of last year authorizing the expenditure of $55,000,000 collected from various sources for the purpose of paying judgments, reconditioning boats, and so forth. Up to date out of that $55,000,000 authorized in the last appropriation bill the Shipping Board has collected $8,140,000. The proposal is to continue the authority they had under the last appropriation bill and permit them to collect until the amount would reach the sum of $55,000,000. It is possible before the close of the fiscal year, that the Shipping Board may be put to it to collect the $55,000,000. They have authority to do it or to collect the remainder of the amount between the $8,000,000 and the $55,000,000, but it would be bad business policy to force them to do it, and I invite your attention to some things that are confronting the Shipping Board now. We have a number of claims against Belgium, and a number of claims against Great Britain. They have been putting us off for one reason and another, hoping that before this year expires the Shipping Board would be compelled out of its necessity to accept an amount less than we think we should collect, and less than they really owe in order that they may have the funds with which to carry on needed improvements. So I say it would be bad business policy to force the Shipping Board to exercise its authority within the time—before the 1st of July.

Now, we can not lose anything by extending the time. We thought it necessary a year ago to grant this authority. There is just as much necessity for it now as there was then. There is really more necessity for it now because of the fact that if they are put to it in order to do the things necessary, they must sacrifice a part of that which is owing to us.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What was the total amount of the estimates submitted by the Shipping Board?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. On July 1, 1921, the debts amounted to $65,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not asking about that; I am asking about the estimates for 1923.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The estimates for 1923 were $100,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That has been allowed under the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then do you not think you are increasing the appropriations that were asked for by the Shipping Board?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; in one sense it is an increase, but if you do not grant it you are going to compel these people of necessity to make sacrifices that they would not make, in order that these collections may be made within the present fiscal year. So, as a purely business proposition, unless we are of opinion that some abuse or fraud is going to be perpetrated it would be the part of good business to continue this authorization.

Now, I want to call attention to what has been done. In July 1, 1921, there were debts amounting to $65,000,000 and cash on July 1 was $26,000,000, which would leave a balance of indebtedness of $39,000,000. The Navy forgave $16,000,000, so there was on the 1st of July a net amount of $23,000,000 liability. The construction deficiency amounted to $12,000,000, and the United States mail $6,000,000, and the reconditioning of the Leviathan $8,000,000, and admiralty judgments amounting to $3,000,000, or a total of $52,000,000. So if we are to meet these claims, if we are to do the reconditioning and do the things which should be done, admittedly within the authority of this board to do, I can not see any other way than to do this thing or force them to make a collection on the 1st day of July.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What is the objection to having the proceeds of the sales turned into the Treasury and making direct appropriations?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The only objection would be because of the fact that this is a business concern. We have not really anything to compare with it. This is a business concern, and it must of necessity have some leeway where they can take advantage of the situation. Under ordinary circumstances there would be no objection to the gentleman's suggestion, and that is what would be done if it was an ordinary governmental transaction, but it is a business transaction, and they ought to have some business discretion.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. When you made the appropriations for the Shipping Board did you take into consideration the fact that there would be some receipts from these other sources?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. How much did you figure for receipts?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The amount of $55,000,000 includes the amounts collected.

Mr. SNELL. Did you compute the amount that would be collected next year?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] says that this authority to use $55,000,000 was inserted in the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1922, and that there is no reason why it should not now be continued. The fact is that the reason it was inserted in the appropriation bill for the year 1922 was that the Congress adopted that method of providing funds to carry on the work of the Shipping Board instead of making a direct appropriation, but now this year an entirely different situation presents itself, and because it is a most remarkable situation I am going to call it to your attention.

Gentlemen of the House know that it is seldom that a department can get from Congress every dollar it asks, but certainly this is the only instance that I know of in this session where a department gets not only every dollar it asks but in addition thereto $55,000,000 over and above its total estimates.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand the gentleman to state that a full appropriation was made for running the department regardless and without consideration of the receipts from this source.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will tell the gentleman the history of it, and he will appreciate the importance of what I say. The original estimate of the Shipping Board for the fiscal year 1923 as submitted by the Bureau of the Budget was only for $50,000,000. Thereafter at about the time the hearings began they submitted a supplementary estimate for an additional $50,000,000. This subcommittee not only gave them the whole $100,000,000 but in addition thereto, for good measure, inserted this authority to use the unexpended balance of $55,000,000, which the gentleman from Indiana tells you to date amounts to $47,000,000.

The result is that we put at the disposal of the Shipping Board not only the $100,000,000 that they estimated for, but every dollar that is unexpended out of this $55,000,000 on the 1st of July of this year. I will say in fairness to the board that while the gentleman from Indiana tells us that there is to-day unexpended $47,000,000, it has been heretofore estimated that that would be so reduced that on July 1 it would amount to no more than $25,000,000 or $30,000,000. But whatever it is, it is that much more money than they estimated they would need for the next fiscal year. Let us see where they will get funds from. Unlike other years when they had no direct appropriation of cash and had to depend on the sale of assets, they have on this page a direct appropriation of $50,000,000. Then, on the next page they have a direct appropriation of $50,000,000, and then they have the right to use the unexpended balance of the $55,000,000 for which they did not estimate. Then they have the right to use the amount received from the operation of ships and also the amount on hand on July 1. Why this unusual liberality to this board, of all boards?

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much does it make in all?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No man on earth can tell, but certainly in direct appropriations to-day they have $100,000,000, and in addition to that any amount they receive from the operation of ships during the next year, the amount on hand July 1, and out of this $55,000,000 they will get at least $25,000,000 or $30,000,000.

Since this bill passed the House the Shipping Board sent in a deficiency estimate for $12,000,000. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], chairman of the committee, is not as liberal toward the Shipping Board as is my good friend from Indiana. He proceeded to cross-examine the Shipping Board, and when he got through with them they went back to their offices and wrote a letter stating they had decided that they did not need one dollar of the $12,000,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I hope the House will do the same thing with this request for the balance of the $55,000,000. You are not going to hurt the Shipping Board by refusing to agree to this proposition. If you are going to hurt them, do not you know that they would have asked for it when they first submitted their estimate? They did not do so. But if you give it to them you can rest assured it will be spent, because that organization has a genuine disposition to spend all of the money that is put into its hands.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. They had it last year, but they did not spend it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Oh, they did not get it. My friend can rest assured that if they had gotten it, it would have gone.

Mr. SNYDER. I quite agree with the gentleman, but I wondered why they did not spend it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. They have collected only $8,000,000 out of the $55,000,000 to date. Mr. WOOD says they have collected $8,000,000. It is estimated that by July 1 they will collect $20,000,000 to $25,000,000, and that would leave $30,000,000 to spend next year.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana stated that because they had it last year they ought to have it this year, but you gentlemen will recall, because you know I have been talking about these indirect appropriations from time to time, the reason that authority was put in there was that Congress did not appropriate any cash, but said that the money received from sales of these assets could be used to take care of expenditures during this year. Now, that was to do a certain thing, to prevent direct appropriation being made for this year; but is that any reason why we should continue that authority for the next fiscal year, for which in this bill there is an appropriation of $100,000,000 in cash? It is simply an additional appropriation. This is an authorization to turn them loose to spend more money in a very extravagant manner, and we had better vote against the motion of the gentleman from Indiana. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina has unintentionally made a mistake here in reference to the amount of this estimate. There was $50,000,000 which was in a supplemental estimate that came to the committee after the committee was in session. That $50,000,000 was for the purpose of paying claims that could be compromised by the General Government. Now, gentlemen will remember there was a deficiency of some $48,000,000 carried last year for this board, and in order that gentlemen may know exactly——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman from Indiana said I was mistaken. He does not contest the fact that the total estimate submitted by the board was originally $50,000,000 and the supplemental estimate of an additional $50,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The estimate for the continuance included the $55,000,000——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman does not contend that is contained in the estimate that was submitted by the Budget Bureau?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely. Here is what I want to call to the attention of the House, and it is this: Whether we are going to try to represent the best interests of the United States Government or whether we are going unintentionally to lend ourselves to the interests of the foreigners who are trying to take advantage of this situation. I want to call attention to what will result from this proposition.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. PADGETT. How would it do to give them authority to extend the time to collect and adjust these claims and not carry authority for an additional appropriation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, I do not see how that would help matters in that way. That is exactly the proposition of this thing——

Mr. PADGETT. The purpose of your amendment is to continue the authority and also the authority to expend the money collected. Now, my idea is to continue the authority to adjust and collect and turn the money into the Treasury, because you are appropriating the $100,000,000 that they asked for in their estimate.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say that it does not meet this situation. Last year they had a deficiency of $48,500,000. I stated a minute ago that the $55,000,000 was a continuance that was estimated by the Budget. I find I am mistaken in reference to that; it was not estimated for, but they came before us and showed us the necessity of having it, and for that very reason they were provided this deficiency.

Mr. PADGETT. You are proposing to continue this authority to expend money because they had a deficiency last year and you are anticipating that they will have one this next year. Had we better not wait until that deficiency occurs before we appropriate?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not think so. I think Mr. Lasker gave some very good reasons why we should not do this thing. In a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MADDEN] February 24 he made this statement:

> We have thus far realized something less than $6,000,000 out of the $55,000,000. By June 30 we estimate we will have realized $25,000,000. The reason for this is that when I took hold I ordered liquidation ceased until we could make inventory, not only of our physical assets but thoroughly analyze our current assets. To do this required the building up of an organization of men competent for the work, for none such here existed; and after they got in it required time for them to become acquainted with the situation and make a thorough analysis. Thus our incumbency here has perforce passed (in order to do the work efficiently and with a view to good conscience to the Treasury) without our getting any large sum in liquidation; and, even working with expedition but with the principles we have laid down for ourselves, we can not look forward to receiving over $25,000,000 out of liquidation before July 1, unless we are willing to make sacrifices of the Government funds in order to bring in collections, which under no circumstances will we be willing to make.
> Let me point out that our debtors follow the actions of Congress very closely. Some of the very largest debtors, including foreign Governments, I believe, are holding off settlements with us, feeling that if they wait until 1 minute before 12 o'clock midnight of June 30, should Congress not make the $55,000,000 appropriation continuing, they will get a handsome discount. In other words, the attitude of these debtors toward the Shipping Board is that if we are forced by congressional action to realize $55,000,000 by July 1 we will pay a large sum in the way of discount in order to realize this liquidation, because they grasp our ambition to liquidate the indebtedness of the board, knowing that we are properly desirous of establishing a record for having so done, and that the only way we can liquidate this indebtedness is through the realization of the $55,000,000 fund.
> But where they are mistaken is that we are not so keen to accomplish this ambition as to be willing to make the sacrifice they have in mind. Therefore, if Congress does not make this appropriation continuing, and if it should have happened that we would be weak enough to yield to a possible situation such as I describe, the country would have its assets in the Shipping Board more or less slaughtered on June 30; whereas, if we waited until July, we could get a proper settlement. And this slaughtering would in some cases have been in the interests of foreigners and of foreign Governments.
> There can be no doubt that the Shipping Board can realize the whole $55,000,000 if it so desires by making this sort of sacrifice; and if we do so realize it we will attain our ambition of liquidating the indebtedness of the Shipping Board. Shall Congress, by not making the appropriation continuing, penalize us because we treat our public trust with good conscience? That is the sole question involved, and I bespeak your firm and potent cooperation in making certain that the $55,000,000 appropriation is made continuing; for, as a practical thing, if it is not made continuing, to whatever extent we have an unrealized portion of it by July 1 we will have to come in subsequently with a deficiency which will become a direct levy on the Treasury.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield.

Mr. SNELL. What would be the harm in extending the authority for them to collect the money after the 1st of July, and when it is collected turn it into the general fund of the Treasury instead of the Shipping Board, and if it is necessary let them come here and ask for what money they want and let us look it over and see whether it is a proper expenditure at the time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The trouble about that is this: They have a lot of obligations which must be met. They have got a lot of cargo charges——

Mr. SNELL. It will be a long time, according to the letter, before they get this money.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That might possibly be, but whenever they do get it they ought to pay these debts. There are a lot of these debts, cargo charges, insurance charges, and all of that character, and the trouble is we do not discriminate between this and an ordinary governmental function. This is a business being conducted according to business principles. They ought to have some money out of which to pay their debts.

Mr. SNELL. How much money have they on hand at the present time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I can not tell the gentleman offhand.

Mr. SNELL. A considerable sum?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not think they have any considerable sum, for the reason that before they commenced to make these collections they tried to get an inventory and tried to find out where they were at, so as to make an intelligent settlement whenever one was made, and until recently they have not been doing very much at it.

Mr. SNELL. On the 1st of July this appropriation becomes available, does it not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. They will have plenty of funds at that time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Not for this purpose. And this is the only fund out of which they can pay these charges. They will have $50,000,000 out of which to pay compromised claims, and which must be confined entirely to them.

Mr. SNELL. We would have to pay them if we never collected any of this money. Would it not be a better business proposition to come before the House and say that we owe so much money and are obliged to pay it, when it would be up to us to appropriate the money?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that if this was a governmental activity, he would be right about it, but every time they pay a cargo charge or a commission or an insurance policy, does the gentleman think they ought to come to Congress and ask authority to do it?

Mr. SNELL. No, sir; I do not. We have already appropriated $100,000,000 to do that. If they need another bunch of money, of $50,000,000 or $75,000,000, they should come to us for it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. There is one of two ways to do it: First, by permitting them to pay these charges when they make these collections and to do as the gentleman suggests, or have them come before the deficiency appropriation committee with a statement as to this indebtedness.

Mr. SNELL. We would know something about it then. Now we do not know anything about it.

Mr. MERRITT. Is it true that under the plan proposed by the bill, of permitting them to have their own money, they can make more economical settlements?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Certainly they can. They can get discounts, if they pay within a certain length of time. They can not do that in this way.

Mr. SNYDER. I understand there is a direct appropriation in this bill now for $100,000,000, $50,000,000 for the purpose of operating the shipbuilding scheme; the other $50,000,000 is for the purpose of settling claims that have already been adjusted. Is that correct?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is correct.

Mr. SNYDER. As to the $55,000,000 you ask to have continued, the money to make that up must come from the assets of the Shipping Board, and that they are permitted to use as a revolving fund with which to pay obligations and to clean up the commitments that may come on from time to time in the closing up of the affairs of the Shipping Board? That money must be raised from the assets of the Shipping Board?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is correct.

Mr. SNYDER. So that in reality we are only proposing in this bill $50,000,000 for the direct operation of the Shipping Board? Is not that correct?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. SNYDER. I agree with the gentleman who just preceded me, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], that it is a perfectly proper business proposition for the Shipping Board to take such assets as it has and turn them into money with which to pay its obligations, and I think it should have the control of that.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any difference between taking it out of the Treasury now, or, as soon as they get something, paying them?

Mr. SNYDER. I think so. I think in the management of any business that it should have the right to adjust itself from day to day, as business comes along, to the advantage of the business itself——

Mr. DOWELL. But you are appropriating this much additional.

Mr. SNYDER (continuing). Rather than wait six months or a year to get a settlement.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman from Indiana does not contend that after July 1 they would not have the authority to sell ships unless this provision is continued?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. But I do contend this, that unless this authorization is permitted they would have no right to take any portion of the money that they might get from the settlement of these claims, or they have got against these foreign Governments and against people here for sales and purchases, and use it in the conduct of their business.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is right. Under the law which this Congress passed just two years ago they had the authority to sell, and after July 1 the proceeds from such sales to go into the Treasury. And that was why the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], presiding during the consideration of this bill, sustained the point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. These collections that I am talking about being made are not from the sales they are going to make hereafter. It is from the collection of things now due.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That money when received will go into the Treasury. If your provision remains in the bill it will not go into the Treasury but to the Shipping Board.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Are these obligations due to the operation of the ships to which this $55,000,000 applies?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Some of them are for sale of ships to the English Government, and some to the Belgian Government, and some for supplies.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Those are the assets; but I mean the obligation to which you refer, and for which this $55,000,000 is appropriated. That is to discharge what obligation—obligations due to the operation of the ships?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I put that in the RECORD a while ago. I stated what it was for. Part of it is for operating expenses, part for insurance charges, and $23,000,000 is to retire debts and pay charter hire and insurance, and for supplies.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. In connection with operations?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Why would not this $55,000,000 be available for that purpose?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The $55,000,000 we have appropriated is for the purpose of settling claims.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. But there is another $50,000,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is for operations.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Why would not that be available to pay the expenses that arose out of operations?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Simply because of the fact that they have mortgages against them, outstanding claims, about which there is no dispute, and they ought to be settled. I expect that there are a great many gentlemen here who have people back home who are hoping that some time they will get their pay from the Shipping Board.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee rose.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has been stated that the total amount of the estimates, both original and supplemental, for 1923 were $100,459,000. Every dollar of that sum has been allowed. Now this amendment, which was never estimated for, which so far as the estimates and hearings show has never been requested by the chairman of the Shipping Board, Mr. Lasker, will increase the actual estimates submitted to Congress by $30,000,000, possibly, according to the statement that has been made on the floor.

I am not going to delay the House by any extended remarks of my own, but I am going to read to the House the statement of Mr. Lasker, made before the committee last August, denouncing in strong terms the policy of Congress in making available these indefinite sums, and asking Congress to withdraw from him the right to use any portion of the $55,000,000 for operating or current expenses of the Shipping Board. He says this, and I read from pages 55 and 56 of the hearings on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which was passed in August:

> Now, before you go any further, there is one thing that should be covered here, because it is very important. You have made an appropriation that we can use $55,000,000 out of the sale of ships, etc. Last year we collected from the sale of ships in round figures practically $20,000,000. In my statement to the press I say that we collected $200,000,000 from ships and other capital assets. One of those capital assets was over $100,000,000 from the War Department.
> Mr. KELLEY. That was from Congress.
> Mr. LASKER. Yes; in a roundabout way. None of those things really show up, and I think that has largely to do with the inefficiency of the Shipping Board and of government generally, because you gentlemen do not make us show up what we lose. How can I get efficient men under me if the figures do not actually show their mistakes or their profits; that is, if they can juggle by selling assets so that it does not show up a loss? You have killed your efficiency to begin with. When we make a loss there I want to show it, and I want to cover into the Treasury every dollar we get from any source.
> Mr. BYRNS. And then receive a direct appropriation for every dollar you use.
> Mr. LASKER. Yes, sir. For instance, I have a claim against the British Government that I inherited for $12,000,000. I do not want to keep that $12,000,000. Any assets that were there when we came in I want to cover into the Treasury, and I want you to pass a law ordering me to cover them into the Treasury, and then I want you to measure what we use under my chairmanship and then we will not have any misunderstanding.
> Mr. KELLEY. You do not want that to apply to your freight receipts?
> Mr. LASKER. That is operating income created under us, and that belongs to us, but what we inherited I do not want. I am also asking the Director of the Budget to help me get a law passed that if we use up anything from the physical assets we are to be charged with it. That is done in every commercial institution, and any other policy makes for cheating and for incompetency. How can I with thousands of employees under me control them, if they can get stuff for nothing by act of Congress and then fool me as to what they do with it? You have undermined me before I get a chance.
> You have authorized $55,000,000 in that way. In the first place, we can not get $55,000,000 out of the sale of ships, etc., and please repeal that. The Congress ought not to want to put itself in the position of ordering a thing as unwise as that, because we can not, in the first place, ever realize that much, and it continues this vicious system of letting us use assets which we inherited. As will be explained to you later, we have about $500,000,000 worth of face value, quick assets that may be worth something.

Gentlemen, I repeat, Mr. Lasker did not ask you, through the Budget Bureau or in the hearings which he had before the committee, for this appropriation. We have given the Shipping Board every dollar that it asked, and certainly we ought not to increase the appropriation beyond its request.

Mr. SNYDER. What was the date of that statement?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This was in August.

Mr. SNYDER. That was shortly after he took over the Shipping Board, was it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. I was in error about the date. This was on July 27 instead of in August.

Mr. SNYDER. He is not talking quite so enthusiastically that way now. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. WASON rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire is recognized.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the new chairman of the Shipping Board has been quoted to you within six weeks from the time he entered upon his duties, which he has been discharging since the 1st of July last, I would like to call your attention to some subsequent statements made by the same gentleman after he had acquired more experience, after he had had time in which to find out what the condition he inherited was, and, as you gentlemen know, he told us when this Congress was assembled. For the first time the people of the country and the Congress knew just what the condition of the Shipping Board was when he assumed office. Nobody in the years gone by had told us; nobody but the Divine Ruler himself knew what that condition was.

Now, then, contrast with what the gentleman said soon after he took charge last summer his statement made before this committee last December, found at page 890 of the hearings before this subcommittee. He was questioned by Mr. WOOD. I read:

> Mr. WOOD. Here is one of the troubles of the Shipping Board, I think; that is, when the Shipping Board finds itself in need of money they go out and sell something, whether they receive the worth of it or not.

In other words, out of the properties of the Shipping Board, scattered in different parts of this country, if they needed money—and I believe they have needed it in the months and years gone by—they would go out and sell as salvage the properties which the taxpayers of this country had acquired by the outlay of money contributed to the Treasury. The Treasury in turn turned it over, and the property had been acquired and paid for out of those funds, and they would sell that property for what they could get for it. And Mr. Lasker says:

> If you will read the record of the Appropriations Committee the last time I appeared, you will see that I emphasized the fact that the action of Congress in forcing the Shipping Board to find its money through the liquidation of assets would result in just that sort of thing.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. After I finish reading this answer. I read:

However, such sales as we make are made because it is good business to make them, regardless of our needs, because we would rather come to Congress for a deficiency than to make an unconscionable sacrifice of these assets. The best proof of that is the fact that so far all we have taken in at the outside is about $4,000,000 of the $55,000,000 that we could have taken in. We might have taken in a large part of the $55,000,000, but we would not sacrifice those assets.

That is what he said before this subcommittee when we were holding hearings last December.

Mr. DOWELL. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. In view of that statement, and in view of the statement of the gentleman that they would not sacrifice the property, is it not possible that the committee could have waited until they did collect this money, and then have made the appropriation?

Mr. WASON. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that I suppose it would be possible, but it is a good business guess that they will not succeed in collecting all of this $55,000,000 prior to the 1st day of July next without sacrifice. If they should succeed in collecting it before July 1, Congress will be in no position to give them the advantage of those receipts thus obtained to use in the ordinary activities early in the next fiscal year.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that we had better exercise a little judgment of our own in the appropriation of this money? After the property has been sold and the money is in the Treasury, is not that the time for the gentleman to come and ask for this appropriation, instead of asking for it in advance?

Mr. WASON. Oh, Mr. Speaker, there are as many different minds upon the question of what is wise to do in a given situation as there are people in a community. In reply to the inquiry of my friend from Iowa, I, for one, can only say that when I find a faithful employee conducting business for me in a businesslike way I do not watch him and insinuate that he is dishonest and that he is making mistakes, but I encourage him as long as he succeeds and pursues the course of good, sound business judgment according to my viewpoint.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. Wait a minute. I say to my friend that I am convinced that the interests of the taxpayers of the country are subserved under the administration of Mr. Lasker, and I never saw him until he appeared before the committee of which I happen to be a member, although I had heard of him before. I am satisfied that since he took the office he has conducted it in the main upon sound business principles, that he to-day is conducting it upon sound business principles, that he and his associates are attempting to get the high dollar out of the useless property now owned by the Shipping Board, and wind up its affairs at the earliest possible date and stop the constant drain from the Treasury that has been going on since the day we established Government activities in building ships years ago.

Mr. DOWELL. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. I certainly will.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman think it is casting any reflection upon the distinguished chairman of the Shipping Board if Congress says to him, "Collect this money and put it into the Treasury and then let Congress pass judgment upon whether or not it shall be appropriated for any purpose"?

Mr. WASON. That, my friend, is one way of doing business.

Mr. DOWELL. It is the way you would do business with any employee that you had.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman does not know me well enough to say how I would conduct business, and in answer to his interjection, I can say that I would not conduct it in that way. To a man in whom I had confidence I would give a little discretion and make him report to me, and if he was doing business to my satisfaction I would encourage him along the line he was pursuing.

Mr. DOWELL. That is just what I want him to do. I want him to report to us, instead of our giving him entire discretion.

Mr. WASON. He does report every dollar that he has to pay bills that are due. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] knows that it has been a burning disgrace to the American administration and to Congress itself that we have been withholding payment of claims against the Shipping Board an unreasonable length of time.

Mr. DOWELL. If Congress is in any way responsible for conditions in the Shipping Board, it seems to me the time to stop it is now, and not give them any money except through actual appropriations for needs that are brought before us, when we know what we are giving the money for.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from Iowa reminds me of the quaint old story of the farmer who locked his barn after his fine pair of horses had been stolen.

Mr. DOWELL. I am trying to get the barn locked before this $55,000,000 gets away from us. That is what I am trying to do.

Mr. WASON. Then we should have done it years ago instead of now, as this will be used to adjust obligations long overdue.

Mr. DOWELL. But let us save this $55,000,000 while we can. It is a small sum, I know, but let us save it.

Mr. WASON. It has not been saved yet. It has not been collected yet. It is out in cold assets scattered over the country.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has paid a very high compliment to what he regards as the business ability of the chairman of the Shipping Board, and the gentleman has confidence in his business ability.

Mr. WASON. I certainly have.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman heard read the declaration of business principles which the chairman of the Shipping Board made to the subcommittee last July?

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think that the declaration then made by the chairman of the Shipping Board was a sound proposition?

Mr. WASON. It was sound.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If it was sound then, why is it not sound now?

Mr. WASON. And his declaration made last December was also sound, and at that time he was more familiar with the conditions existing in the Shipping Board than he was in August when he spoke before.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WASON. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. Has it not been our experience that the Shipping Board are a mighty sight more careful about spending money if they have to come to Congress and ask a direct appropriation than they have been when they have spent it out of the revolving fund of $55,000,000 and nobody has had to make an account of it? Has not that been our actual experience?

Mr. WASON. To answer the specific inquiry of the gentleman from New York I will have to say that I can not answer it along the line that his inquiry would indicate. From the time when we first provided funds to create this Government activity down to and including a very few months ago there has been a constant flow of gold out of the Treasury in unlimited amounts for these purposes.

Mr. SNELL. Let us put as many brakes on it as we can.

Mr. WASON. But we ought to have put the brakes on long ago. I would like to see this matter wound up at the earliest possible day, so as to know where we stand and know that the whole matter is behind us.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TINCHER. I listened carefully to the reading of the position taken by Chairman Lasker last August, and then I listened to the statement made by Chairman Lasker in December, and I submit that Chairman Lasker has not changed his opinion, and that he still stands upon the same ground that he stood upon last August, and I invite the gentleman to call my attention or the attention of the committee to any discrepancy between the statement read by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the statement read by himself.

Mr. WASON. The statement made by the chairman last August does not disagree with that made in December, but they vary a bit. He wanted to pay the claims against the Shipping Board at the earliest possible moment. He said and has repeatedly said that they could probably force collection of all of the $55,000,000 prior to July 1 at a loss or discount.

Mr. SNELL. Has anybody contended that he should collect it before the 1st of July? No one contends that they should collect it. We are willing to extend the time, but we want the money put into the Treasury instead of going back into the funds of the Shipping Board.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. I will.

Mr. CARTER. What is the advantage to the Government by giving the Shipping Board the right to use the money instead of turning it in to the Treasury and letting Congress appropriate it next fall?

Mr. WASON. I do not know as there is any advantage except this: As I understand it, he can spend it if he can collect it prior to July 1. If he collected it so late that he could not expend it, it is covered into the Treasury anyway. The inducement would be for the members of the Shipping Board to force collections as fast as they could in order that they could have the money to use. Of course, if the Shipping Board knew that Congress would appropriate the money that is necessary with reasonable dispatch, there would be little difference.

Mr. CARTER. Does not the gentleman think that Congress ought to be the judge of that very thing—whether it will appropriate the money expeditiously and reasonably for the Shipping Board to spend?

Mr. WASON. Of course I do, but the gentleman from Oklahoma knows that when apppropriations come in its takes time to get them through both branches of Congress.

Mr. CARTER. But it is one of the very best checks on extravagance.

Mr. WASON. I do not think there has been any extravagance, not any that would cause criticism in the administration of the Shipping Board in the last eight months.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WASON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the Shipping Board authorized to collect this amount this year or next year or until it is collected without further legislation?

Mr. WASON. Yes; until collected.

Mr. MANN. No authority to collect is carried by this item?

Mr. WASON. No.

Mr. MANN. The authority to collect exists whether this year or next year until collection is made—I think it does.

Mr. WASON. I think it was in the original deficiency bill.

Mr. MANN. Wherever it was, this does not extend the authority to collect. If they have the authority to collect, the only question here is whether they shall have the authority to expend the money in the next fiscal year.

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Congress meets on the 1st of December next, a little over five months after the beginning of the fiscal year, and it soon has a deficiency bill before it. There is never much delay about passing an urgent deficiency bill at the short session of Congress. Can not they get along with $50,000,000 which is appropriated in the bill?

Mr. WASON. My best information is that there will be a deficiency this year.

Mr. MANN. In the next fiscal year?

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will not $50,000,000 actually appropriated be sufficient to carry them for at least six months?

Mr. WASON. It ought to.

Mr. MANN. Because if it will not, this will not take them through the fiscal year.

Mr. WASON. I think it ought to.

Mr. MANN. If it will, we will be in session if we are not all dead.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WASON. I will.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In addition to the $55,000,000 about which the gentleman from Illinois inquires, it is a fact that the bill makes available for some purposes the amount of money on hand July 1, and in case there should be any money from the operation of the ships it makes that available.

Mr. WASON. Yes; but if there is a deficiency there will not be much available.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The amount of $55,000,000 is to be used for the claims, as I understand?

Mr. WASON. Not entirely; we make a specific authorization for the settlement of claims.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I understood the gentleman to make a statement with reference to securing discounts if they had this money available.

Mr. WASON. Discounts from people who owed the Shipping Board.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman does not contest the fact that the Shipping Board even as late as January 7 asked only $50,000,000 for claims and $50,000,000 for the operation of ships, and that in addition to the $100,000,000 we have given them the amount on hand July 1, 1922, and any amount received from operations, and then the unexpended balance of the $55,000,000 over and above their official estimate which I hold in my hand.

Mr. WASON. This item in the bill carries $50,000,000 for the operation of ships.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. WASON. And $50,000,000 to settle claims.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And that is all they asked for.

Mr. WASON. And what can be collected out of what is not collected this year of the $55,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And then the operation of ships, in the same paragraph.

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And then any amount on hand July 1.

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman agree with me that the official estimate of January 7 asked for only $100,000,000, and did not ask for the use of these other funds?

Mr. WASON. January 7?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; January 7, 1922, an estimate sent by the President to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WASON. That is the Budget's submission.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The President always sends it.

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. From the Budget Bureau.

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And the total estimate was $100,000,000.

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And anything over that $100,000,000 is over and above what the Bureau of the Budget asked for.

Mr. WASON. Over their estimates, but it is a part of our hearings before the committee relating to funds or credits that are due the Government in the hands or possession of the Shipping Board, which we want them to collect at the earliest possible date consistent with good business expedition.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman and I do not disagree at all. What happened was that after the estimate was submitted they submitted a supplemental estimate, and then they came before your committee and expressed a desire to have this authority.

Mr. WASON. They wanted it continued.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. As a matter of fact, the Shipping Board contemplated last July, when we gave them the $55,000,000, that they would be able to collect this money during the year and pay off a lot of construction claims and other kinds of claims. Now they have reached a point where they can not collect the $55,000,000, and of course the claims they contemplated paying off are open. They are of the opinion that if you continue this they may be able to get more favorable settlements out of these people than they would if the people knew they had to wait and come to Congress for the entire amount of money. I agree with the gentlemen on the other side, that Chairman Lasker did make that statement last December, but there is an old proverb that wise men change their minds and fools never.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman will agree that they have $50,000,000 with which to settle claims.

Mr. EDMONDS. There are two classes of claims. We have the old construction claims, and we have the ordinary operating claims. We have $200,000,000 worth of claims. It does not make any difference whether you settle them this way or come into the House and settle them in another way. They have to be settled in some way at some time.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In this estimate from the Bureau of the Budget they refer to both those claims, the toal being $219,000,000, and he winds up with this statement:

> This leaves approximately $100,000,000 of claims for adjudication by the Shipping Board, and it is for the purpose of negotiating for the settlement of these claims on a compromise basis that the Shipping Board requests the appropriation of $50,000,000.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think the gentleman will find that they contemplate collecting this $55,000,000 and putting it in on the construction claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 31.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana) there were—ayes 19, noes 77.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 35. Page 34, line 9, strike out all of lines 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Not more than 13 officers or employees, including 7 attorneys, of the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall be paid an annual salary or compensation in excess of $11,000."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield me five minutes?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when this bill came before the House on the report of the Committee on Appropriations it carried as a limitation practically that which is now contained in the Senate amendment. Last year there was a contest in the House as to the number of employees who might be employed at high salaries. I think the House first provided three, perhaps, and then the number which was finally provided for was six officers or employees whose salaries could be in excess of $11,000. When the bill was before the House the House struck out the committee recommendation for 13 high-salaried attorneys and other officers and reduced it to 6 and added a provision that no one should be employed by the Shipping Board in excess of $25,000 a year. Well, we sometimes read in the newspapers about gentlemen being engaged at a salary of $150,000 a year, which I think is pure bunk [laughter and applause], good newspaper advertising. But whatever the case may be, the Government ran along for a number of years and only paid the President of the United States $25,000 a year salary, and we have no right to start in with the idea of paying salaries that reach to the mountain top to all Government employees. [Applause.] I do not expect the departments to be run on a bank clerk's salary, but $25,000 a year is a reasonably high salary, and we ought not to pay it to anybody in the Government employ other than the President of the United States. [Applause.] I do not believe we ought to employ a great number of attorneys in the Shipping Board at salaries in excess of $11,000 a year. Six thousand dollars is enough. Let us just stick to the amendment we put in in the House when we had it before the House before [applause] and stand pat, if gentlemen know what that means. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly apparent what the action of this House will be, but I will not let this moment pass without at least bringing to your attention the contention of the Shipping Board and what is going to happen if the proposal submitted by the gentleman from Illinois is carried out. As I stated before and wish to state now, if this were an ordinary governmental function, I would be just as persistent as other gentlemen here that these salaries are too large. I have been very persistent in the past, and I think we are paying now a great many salaries that should not be paid, certainly in contrast with salaries in positions where a great deal more responsibility and services are required and where the officers do not receive half the amount. But here is the situation that was foisted upon this country during the war. We have got a mess here that we would all like to be rid of, and it is worth as much as anybody's reputation to be connected with. [Laughter and applause.] But it was not the making of this present administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] This thing stunk to high heaven when the present administration took hold of it. They have had a reasonable degree of success in bringing some order out of the disorder they found. Their business is scattered all over the face of the earth and the seven seas, and the plunder, waste, and ravage going on they have been trying to rectify and clear up. Of necessity they had to have men who were conversant with that peculiar kind of business. We have not anything to compare with it. There is not anything comparable with this Shipping Board business. It is the biggest business in the world. There is not anything to compare with it. The great United States Steel Corporation is a mere bagatelle so far as the volume of the business is compared with that of the Shipping Board in the amount of the responsibility and property that is under its control. So we have no gauge by which to measure the service or the quality of the service. Now, I expect there are a great many men in this House, good lawyers and good business men, who would be absolutely lost if they were at the head of some of these great divisions requiring this technical knowledge.

A striking example was called to my attention the other day. This Shipping Board has been losing hundreds of thousands of dollars each year through the incompetency of its insurance department.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that, of course, we are spending money on the Shipping Board to put it in position to carry passengers and freight, in view of accommodating American citizens and making money. There was read this morning from the desk where the gentleman now stands a letter from a proposed traveler. He had written to the Shipping Board, as he had written to several others engaged in transatlantic shipping, for information with respect to their sailings and their boats and accommodations. He has been waiting for six weeks and has not had a reply yet from the Shipping Board. Every other concern to which he wrote answered promptly and gave him all the details, but he is still waiting for information telling him where he can sail from or what accommodation he can get on a Shipping Board ship.

Mr. BUTLER. In what language did he write it? [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In plain English. An $800 a year clerk could answer such a letter as that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would be a remarkable circumstance if, out of all that volume of business and all the inquiries that are made, only one isolated case of seeming neglect could present itself. The mails sometimes go wrong. There are a whole lot of things that might happen. I am not here for the purpose of excusing any of the neglect of the Shipping Board any more than the neglect of the old Shipping Board.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That letter is so characteristic of every governmental function that I call attention to it again. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I believe that every Member of Congress has characteristic letters, which, if he would bring here and print in the RECORD, would make it two or three times larger than it is every day.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that I observe that the number of attorneys is increased by one, and most of these high-salaried people are attorneys. Is it not true—at least, I gather it from reading the hearings—that in almost every case where there is a matter of important litigation, legal counsel are hired, and that the regular attorneys in the Shipping Board, who are paid these salaries, do not do that business?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is not correct. They started out doing that thing, but they found it was costing four or five times what they hoped to conduct their business for if they had regular counsel.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They do have legal counsel, do they not, in various cases?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They have both, but here is what they attempted to do: If they had an admiralty case, involving a large amount of money, they hired an admiralty lawyer to go through that case and they found that in half a dozen cases they paid more in proportion than they would have paid at these larger salaries for a whole year. We have got more litigation than all the shipping companies in the United States put together, and the men who have to appear in the various courts have to meet the best legal minds of the day, and in consequence the United States Government is the loser by it. Here is a situation and not a condition. We have either got to meet these men with men of the same character and caliber being presented there, or else we are going to have happen to us what we know happens in a big lawsuit with bigger men on the other side of the case.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I agree that you have got to get good lawyers; but if you have to hire special lawyers, there is no advantage in having these. If the gentleman says the regular lawyers are going to do this business and that we are going to quit hiring outside legal counsel, I agree with him.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is exactly what I said. That is the purpose of doing this thing; and unless we do it we are not only going to lose more money, so far as fees are concerned, but more money when it comes to the rendering of the judgments.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was stated that there were $250,000,000 in claims filed in the Court of Claims and other Federal courts that the Department of Justice must defend, and that there were possibly $150,000,000 more of claims which would probably be presented. Now, the Attorney General, Mr. Daugherty, states through his representatives that he is not violating the rule of his department in paying over $12,000 a year for any attorney; and some of these claims that they are defending amount to $125,000,000. If the Attorney General can get competent attorneys to fight these claims for $1,000 a month, why can not the Shipping Board do the same thing?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will tell you why. Take the men who are employed in the Department of Justice, assistants to the Attorney General. There is a certain modicum of honor attached to that thing [laughter] and there is a certain degree of permanency. Now it is hoped, and these gentlemen promise us, that if they have a sufficient staff they will clean up these dockets and get the whole thing cleaned up within a year.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Why not put all these men into a position where they would get that "modicum of honor" and not have to pay them such large salaries?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Because the Department of Justice does not want them, and the Department of Justice, instead of trying to encourage the character of thing you are talking about, on the other hand is encouraging this Shipping Board to take care of its own lawsuits. It has enough of its own business to attend to without this thing. They have not the force, and you would have to increase that force, and then what would happen to you? Instead of having a lot of United States attorneys for a year, you would have them for all time.

Mr. CARTER. But we would have the gentleman from Indiana here to stop them.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not think you would be doing a good job. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman think, if we adopt the Senate amendment, that they would probably use some of these lawyers now on the roll at $11,000 and less and increase them to the point where they were at before we put on the limitation of $11,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That might be. And this is the situation, and I want to bring it before you gentlemen, so that you may know: Some of these men, when their salaries were reduced under this amendment before, announced their intention to quit, and some did quit, but others were induced to stay for a year, with the hope that possibly they might get through, or if not, that they would get a larger salary. Others of these men have announced their intention to quit, and their resignations are in the hands of the board now.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Some of them, I am told, were getting $15,000 and $20,000 before, and, so far as I know, none of those quit when they were reduced to $11,000. The names of those gentlemen on the high-priced list remain on the roll, notwithstanding the fact that they had been previously on the roll at a much higher price.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I find here in the hearings a very illustrative case, confirming what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has stated. These claims commissioners are now receiving $11,000 a year. Here is what they did receive previously. I read:

> Mr. GRIFFIN. You gave the composition of that commission, but you did not say whether they were to draw any salaries or not.
> Mr. SCHLESINGER. Mr. Lasker has already put that into the record.
> Mr. GRIFFIN. Are they drawing salaries?
> Mr. SCHLESINGER. Oh, yes. Judge Meals was engaged at $17,000 and the others at salaries of $15,000; then when Congress passed that limitation in the appropriations act they were cut to $11,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Are they still working?

Mr. HARRISON. They are still acting.

Mr. BUTLER. Maybe they will stand a little further reduction.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would like to know from the gentleman from Indiana whether these high-priced lawyers are the ones who are the trial lawyers, or whether the trial lawyers are these other men who are working down there for $4,000 and $5,000 a year?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Those who are receiving the higher salaries would be the ones at the head of these various divisions.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the men who do the work of trying cases are the men who are working for $4,000 and $5,000 a year?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Some of those trial lawyers are drawing $9,000 and some $10,000. They are drawing various prices.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I happen to know personally one of the attorneys working for the Shipping Board, the former dean of the law school in a State university. He is getting $5,000 a year, and is being sent all over the country to try these cases, and he is very successful in that work. It seems to me if these high-priced experts would look around a little they could find many competent lawyers to do this work.

Mr. BARKLEY. How much is he getting?

Mr. CHALMERS. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have stated here before and I wish to state now that I suppose you could go out into any little county seat in any State in the Union and find just as good if not better lawyers than some of those who are receiving these higher salaries; but those men are not going to give up their practice at the county seat and come down here and besmirch themselves for a year or two and lose their practice and then go back home again.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TINCHER. I wish to say to the gentleman that some time last summer, when we had up a bill for the Shipping Board, it was disclosed that some men who were drawing $2,400 under the former administration were drawing $10,000, $11,000, $12,000, and $14,000 under this administration. Have those men been discharged yet?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know whether they have or not.

Mr. TINCHER. If they have not, I do not want to vote to raise anybody's salary.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I exposed some of those gentlemen myself; and here is what happened under the former administration, and I suppose the same thing might have happened under a Republican administration. There were a lot of little fellows who got appointed to $1,500 positions because they did not go to war. That was the reason they got those positions; and when the war was over and the clouds passed away they had themselves promoted under the former administration and some of them under this administration.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will say to the gentleman that I know of one lawyer who served under the former administration who is not one of the favorites, a man who was drawing $4,500 a year, and who is still drawing it under this administration, not being one of the elite or elect, but who is one of the best trial lawyers they have got, and he is being sent all over the country to try cases, and I know of one case involving a million dollars, and he was sent out to try that case.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that in his explanation he has not touched upon the question of the reason why he agreed to strike out the limitation of $25,000 as a maximum, which a good many of us would like to see retained. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I started a while ago to call attention to the necessity of having somebody to protect the interests of the United States Government with reference to maritime insurance. They have discovered that because of inefficiency in the insurance department they have been losing hundreds of thousands of dollars. They tell me they can not get a man who is big enough to take that place for less than $25,000 or $30,000 a year; and if we had had that character of a man within the last two or three years they would have saved five times more than all of the proposed increases in this amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, do I understand the gentleman to mean that they can get that type of a man for $30,000 a year or $33,000, but can not get him for $25,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I suppose they will have to have some leeway with which to dicker. I do not know that they have any fixed market price for men of that caliber.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. If we strike out the Senate amendment, how many lawyers will they have left down there?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I can not tell the gentleman exactly how many.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is not the total 85 now? I understand there were 78 provided for in your bill when it left the House, and when it went to the Senate there were 7 more added there.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In the city of New York there are individual law firms that have half as many men engaged in the conduct of the business of a single firm as you will find in the whole Shipping Board.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. But is it not true that the total is 85?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think that is true.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on receding and concurring in Senate amendment No. 35.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

Mr. MANN. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman make the required statement in order to get unanimous consent?

Mr. KINKAID. I will state to the gentleman from Texas that I called this up by agreement with the ranking minority member of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KINKAID, Mr. SINNOTT, and Mr. HAYDEN.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 16, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our great and gracious God, we come this morning appalled by Thy greatness but wooed by Thy graciousness. We are assured that whatever need may be pressing upon us, Thou art willing to supply our needs and out of the fullness of Thine heart to meet every necessity of life in all its plans and purposes. Grant that our land may become more and more eminent as the land whose God is the Lord. We ask everything in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, March 9, 1922, when, on request of Mr. JONES of Washington and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I present the memorial of Harold L. TARIFF POLICY FOR THE SOUTH.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have here an editorial from the Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram on the subject of the proper tariff policy toward the South. I think it will be of great interest, and I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Fort Worth Star-Telegram.]

IN THE INTEREST OF THE SOUTH.

Whether the estimate made by Col. Ike T. Pryor that $1,000,000,000 a year will be added to the value of southern products if Congress accepts the schedules of the Southern Tariff Congress and incorporates them in the tariff bill is regarded as high or not, certainly every effort should be made to have fair recognition given to the products of the South in the bill.

Col. Pryor, who is chairman of the schedule committee of the Southern Tariff Congress, which meets in Fort Worth on March 15, outlines the schedules to be asked, as follows:

"We have indorsed the schedules filed by the western tariff bloc with the Senate Finance Committee, which call for a rate of 3½ cents per pound on beef, 2½ cents per pound on mutton, 4 cents on lambs, three-fourths cent on hogs, and 15 cents on unwashed wool.

"We have taken exception to the bloc rate on hides, which is 2 cents green and 6 cents dried. We regard 4 cents per pound on green hides the minimum rate that should be given. Other leading Texas products shown on the bloc schedules are vegetable oils, 4 cents per pound; eggs, 8 cents per dozen; and poultry, 6 cents per pound.

"Important southern items not included in the western tariff bloc and on which tariff duties have been requested by the tariff association are peanuts, pecans, sugar, graphite, manganese, and petroleum, and rates will be fixed Wednesday by the Southern Tariff Congress on these articles."

The greatest obstacle which stands in the way of obtaining proper recognition for southern products is the attitude of most of the Democratic Congressmen and Senators on this matter.

Instead of insisting that any tariff bill passed shall levy duties equitably, without discriminating between sections and industries on political lines but in accordance with the principle of not favoring one class or section at the expense of another, they are assuming an attitude of opposition to the entire tariff program and apparently are willing to have the Republicans pass a measure favoring special industries and sections at the expense of the South in order to make political capital of it later.

The present Congress is going to pass a tariff bill. That can be taken for granted. Democratic opposition can not prevent that. The position of the Southern Tariff Congress is simply that the products of this section of the country, most of which are of the farm and ranch, shall be given equitable protection in keeping with that given the products of other sections.

It is good Democratic doctrine that any tariff levied, no matter what its rates or its purposes, shall be equitably adjusted to the whole country and to all classes in the matter of schedules.

It is good Democratic doctrine that if tariff is levied, no matter what its rates or its purposes, shall be equitably adjusted to the whole country and to all classes in the matter of schedules.

It is good Democratic doctrine that if there is to be a tariff on manufactured articles there should also be a tariff on raw materials.

* * * * * * *

The Southern Tariff Congress represents a great body of producers in the South. We take it that the schedules which it will work out will be based upon a knowledge of conditions and in relation to schedules on the products of other sections and other industries. The delegates to the congress will be men thoroughly capable of working out such schedules and who have a full knowledge of the facts and conditions involved. For this reason we believe they should receive the cooperation of Congressmen and Senators from the South, especially from Texas.

The Southern Tariff Congress is not a political body. It is a business body, and it proposes to have a tariff law based upon principles of equity and justice and not upon mere partisan considerations. It is working for the economic interests of this entire section of the country and is seeking to prevent discrimination of a kind which will injure the producers of this section. It should receive the support of all intelligent citizens of this section irrespective of party affiliation.

SPECULATIVE TRADING IN COTTON.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask permission to place in the RECORD a statement with reference to the investigation of the American Cotton Exchange in New York showing that the great cotton exchanges are simply bucket shops and an injury to the farmers and that the southern cotton speculators are at the mercy of the New York brokers.

For many years the New York Cotton Exchange has been used principally to gamble in cotton futures instead of a place to buy and sell cotton in a legitimate way. The farmers of the South have lost millions annually on account of this exchange, which has been used to depress the price of cotton and rob the southern farmers. For my part, as I have often stated in the Senate, unless we can confine this exchange to the legitimate buying and selling of actual cotton and stop all gambling in cotton futures I favor abolishing the exchange. Nearly every year they sell cotton futures amounting to ten times the number of bales of cotton produced in the South. Congress should immediately pass legislation preventing the robbery of the southern farmers, who have suffered financially more than any producers in our country.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAY COTTON MART IS "BUCKET SHOP"—BROKERS TESTIFY NEW YORK EXCHANGE OPENLY EXPLOITED SOUTHERN TRADERS.

[By the Associated Press.]

NEW YORK, March 15.

Charges that the American Cotton Exchange is a huge bucket shop, where actual trading is rare and where the southern speculator is at the mercy of the New York broker, were made by former members of the exchange at a "John Doe" investigation conducted by the district attorney's office before Chief City Magistrate McAdoo.

Witnesses testified to numerous instances of "cross-trading," fictitious orders, dummy accounts, "scalping," secret manipulation of unrecorded transactions, sensational advertising designed to woo the accounts of small speculators in the South, and undisguised bucketing of orders.

EXPELLED MEMBERS TESTIFY.

W. B. Wilson and J. H. Watson, members of the firm of Wilson & Co., which was expelled from the exchange last February 28 on charges that they had warned their clients against further dealings with the institution, were principal witnesses for the prosecution.

"When there was cotton for sale in the ring we made bona fide sales for our clients," Mr. Wilson testified. "But the southerner, who is an optimist about the cotton market, almost invariably bought. As a result there seldom was any cotton for sale, and brokers simply 'bucketed' the orders, taking a chance on covering themselves when cotton eventually was offered in the ring."

ORDERS BUCKETED OUTRIGHT.

The witness declared that he withdrew from the exchange after repeated complaints to officials that "it had become absolutely impossible to transact business without bucketing." At the time of his resignation in February, he declared, conditions were such that little trading was done on the floor of the exchange, most of the orders from customers being bucketed outright.

A score of the most prominent members of the exchange, some of them its directors, were named as constituting the "inner circle" of the trading ring.

J. H. Watson, partner in Wilson & Co., testified he first entered the floor of the exchange as a "scalper" for E. L. Dutton & Co., with instructions to "force the market" when actual trading was indulged in.

"Finally they caught me short of the market and then took the market for a walk, not bringing it back for several weeks," the witness declared. He then ceased "scalping" for Dutton and became a member of the exchange, "bucketing" orders on his own account.

ADMITS BUCKETING ORDERS.

"Do you say you bucketed orders, then?" asked Magistrate McAdoo, who is sitting as a grand jury in the investigation.

"Call it what you want," the witness replied. "It is just plain bucketing."

"During the big rush last September, when every southerner was speculating in cotton and we were flooded with buying orders, brokers seldom went to the exchange to do their trading. They didn't have time. They simply marked prices on the sales contracts, sent them out for the signature of the broker with whom they had prearranged to complete the transaction of a fictitious sale, and entered it on their books. Everybody was bucketing."

Several gilt-embossed pamphlets, distributed through the South by New York brokers, were introduced as evidence.

PAMPHLETS AS LURE.

"These should be called to the attention of the postal authorities," Magistrate McAdoo told the prosecuting attorneys.

The pamphlets were entitled: "Southerners Not Slow—A Human Interest Story That Every Red-Blooded Southerner Should Know," "How to Trade in Cotton, Stocks, and Grains—by Randolph Rose," and "Methods of Successful Cotton Traders."

Mr. Rose was cited by each of the witnesses as a member of the biggest firm connected with the American Cotton Exchange and leader in bucketshop methods.

Efforts of counsel for the American Cotton Exchange were balked in their attempts to cross-examine witnesses by Magistrate McAdoo.

CHICAGO, DETROIT & CANADA GRAND TRUNK JUNCTION RAILROAD CO.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From the Committee on Interstate Commerce I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 3268) to authorize the Chicago, Detroit & Canada Grand Trunk Junction Railroad Co., or its successors or assigns, to lease certain of its properties in the State of Michigan. The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That any such lease shall be made subject to the condition in said act that the grant to said railroad company shall cease and determine in the event such railroad shall be discontinued.

PROPOSED REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is disposed of. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] recently introduced a bill proposing to transfer the Forestry Bureau to the Department of the Interior. That bill has aroused much discussion. The Washington Post of Sunday, March 12, published a thoughtful editorial on the subject and I ask that it be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PEOPLE'S PATRIMONY.

The inquiries made by the commission delegated to map out a reorganization of the executive departments are said to have disclosed many glaring inconsistencies and inexcusable sources of extravagance. The report of the commission is in the hands of President Harding, and when published it is expected to create a sensation because of its recommendations for sweeping changes.

A single example of inconsistent grouping of activities and the evils resulting therefrom is furnished by the commission in its discussion of the Forest Service in relation to the Department of the Interior. The Forest Service is in the Department of Agriculture, and the principal arguments in favor of its retention there are that it is allied with agriculture and is in touch with other bureaus of the Department of Agriculture, such as entomology, plant industry, etc. But the bureaus of the Interior Department are in even closer touch with those bureaus of the Department of Agriculture. The Reclamation Service sets aside land for model farms to be developed by the experts of the Department of Agriculture, and the Indian Office, General Land Office, Geological Survey, and other Interior bureaus are in constant contact with the Department of Agriculture.

Inconvenience of all sorts results from the attempt to administer public lands by two executive departments. The Forest Service fails and refuses to cooperate with bureaus in the Interior Department, with serious damages to stockmen, lumbermen, miners, farmers, and others who have a right to expect a square deal from the Government. The lack of a central authority in Washington makes it impossible to coordinate the activities of the bureaus that are created for the public welfare.

The Department of the Interior was created for the purpose of administering and developing the patrimony of the people of the United States. Broadly speaking, the chief duty of the Interior Department is to look after the public lands. It has jurisdiction over homesteads, mineral lands, nonmineral lands, Indian reservations, irrigation projects, surveys, national parks, Alaskan lands, etc. The evident intent of the creators of the Interior Department was to place under one jurisdiction all authority over the public lands. But the Forest Service was gradually expanded in the Department of Agriculture and transformed from a research into an administrative bureau, with the result that constant friction has prevailed.

The Forest Service dictates the course of roads within the national forests, and prevents the construction of highways which are required in the public welfare. It halts a farmer's cow in search of a drink of water at a spring lying a few feet within a forest area. It denies to a pioneering farmer the right to acquire a few feet of timber adjoining his homestead. It sells off the timber on a mining claim, denying the timber to the miner, who must send sometimes thousands of miles for a few sticks of timber which might have been cut from his own claim. It disposes of timber to foreign countries at a time when domestic needs are unsupplied. It does not create additional forest to replace that which is cut, but clings to lands which are not forested at all, and refuses to permit them to be opened for homes.

The chaotic conditions resulting from divided authority over the public lands should be ended forthwith. The reorganization commission has recommended that the forests be administered by the Department of the Interior, just as other lands are administered, whether mineral, desert, oil-bearing, agricultural, or Indian lands. The commission takes the position, which seems to be logical and unassailable, that one authority should be exercised over public lands, without regard to the particular nature of the lands. Only by this method can there be coordination in the various services. When the question arises whether a particular piece of land is forest, agricultural, mineral, or what not, a central authority should decide. The question of surveys is most important in connection with the public lands, and it is most damaging to the public interest that the Geological Survey and the Forest Service survey should follow conflicting systems.

It is high time that political and personal aims should give way to public interest in the reorganization of the bureaus pertaining to the public lands of the United States. Alaska is locked up, a useless treasure house, while thousands of enterprising Americans are deprived of the opportunity to build themselves homes in that great region. A few million acres remain which could be transformed into homes in the continental United States, if the lands suitable for agriculture could be wrested from the dead grip of the Forest Service, which neither utilizes the lands nor permits others to utilize them. Roads should be built to accommodate growing populations throughout the western areas; mines should be opened which are now closed because of imaginary forest uses or because timber is denied to the miners; forests should be started in areas which the Forest Service claims to be unsuitable for forests; water supplies now unavailable should be made available to the people; forests in watersheds and catchment areas should be protected; and the so-called national forests should be overhauled, for the purpose of excluding from them the lands that are not forested and never will be forested.

Congress will have the reorganization commission's report in due time, with the Presidents recommendations thereon. It is to be hoped that the people will be given an opportunity to make their land heritage available for proper use.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT COMMISSION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From the Committee on the Judiciary I ask leave to submit a report (No. 563) in response to the resolution of the Senate numbered 244, requesting the opinion of the Judiciary Committee touching the question of the eligibility of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and Representative BURTON as members of the Foreign Debt Funding Commission. Mr. WALSH of Montana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report to accompany S. Res. 244:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was submitted by the Senate (S. Res. No. 244) the question of the eligibility of Hon. REED SMOOT and Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON to membership on the commission created under the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, in view of the fact that at the time of the passage of the act the former was, as he still is, a Member of the Senate and the latter was, as he still is, a Member of the House of Representatives, respectfully reports that having referred the question so submitted to a subcommittee, consisting of Senators CUMMINS, BRANDEGEE, STERLING, OVERMAN, and WALSH of Montana, it reported that, having investigated the question, the conclusion was reached that the gentlemen named are ineligible, Senators BRANDEGEE, OVERMAN, and WALSH concurring in the report and Senators CUMMINS and STERLING dissenting; that upon the incoming of the said report your committee canvassed the question and now reports that in its opinion the gentlemen mentioned are not, nor is either of them, eligible to membership on the said commission for which they have been nominated by the President of the United States.

In its labors the committee had the assistance of a discussion of the question presented by Senator WALSH, a copy of which is hereto appended, supporting the view that the gentlemen named are not eligible, and in support of the contrary view discussions by Senators CUMMINS and NELSON and an opinion by the Attorney General, which, it is understood, will be made a part of a report to be submitted by the minority of the committee.

In the opinion of the Attorney General reference is made to an earlier opinion of his department, copy of which, with some comments thereon by Senator WALSH, is attached hereto.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. CUMMINS. On behalf of a minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, I submit the report which I send to the desk and ask that it may be read:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

OPINION OF THE MINORITY OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY UPON SENATE RESOLUTION 244.

Mr. CUMMINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following minority report (to accompany S. Res. 244):

The undersigned members of the Committee on the Judiciary, which committee has had under consideration S. Res. 244, are unable to concur in the report of the committee, it being their opinion that the Hon. REED SMOOT and the Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON are eligible for membership on the commission created by the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, entitled "An act to create a commission authorized to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes."

They submit herewith their views upon the subject matter of the resolution.

KNUTE NELSON.
ALBERT B. CUMMINS.
WM. P. DILLINGHAM.
LEBARON B. COLT.
THOMAS STERLING.
RICHARD P. ERNST.
SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, on behalf of the same minority, I ask leave to print, accompanying the report just made, the views which have been already submitted to the committee from the subcommittee, as modified or changed in phraseology to suit the present occasion, and also the views of the chairman of the committee, Mr. NELSON, as well as the report or opinion of the Attorney General rendered upon request of the President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was going to ask unanimous consent for the printing as a public document of the report of the majority just submitted, with the accompanying documents, and with it the report of the minority, with the documents now referred to by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the suggestion is entirely satisfactory to me, but the printing can not be done for a day or two, inasmuch as it is necessary to change the argument in its phraseology so that it will constitute a report to the Senate instead of a report to the full committee by the subcommittee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That, of course, may be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session, for the purpose of considering the four-power treaty.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to lay before the Senate, in connection with the treaties now under consideration, some facts which have not heretofore been discussed, and which, while they bear upon the disarmament treaty directly, have also a very important bearing on the treaty under consideration. I propose to place before the Senate some figures with reference to the relative strength of the navies provided for in the naval treaty; and I believe I can say as a preliminary that the whole status has been misrepresented to the Senate and to the American people. The facts I am about to present are the work of naval experts of a high order, and are buttressed by documentary proof which demands, in my opinion, the attention of this body. If they are not given attention before the four-power treaty is acted upon, we will have so far committed ourselves that probably nothing we can do will extricate us from a dilemma which is fraught, in my judgment, with the very gravest danger.

Let me say now in advance that I was in favor of calling this conference for the purpose of reducing armaments. I am in favor now of every reasonable means which can be adopted to prevent the expenditure of large sums of money in a race for naval superiority. I want to see the useless expense stopped. I believe that it can be stopped without endangering the United States.

Those in control of the conference saw fit to go outside of the purposes for which it was called and to take up the question of a quadruple alliance. It had no necessary connection whatever with the question of disarmament. It was at first denied that any thought of an alliance or treaty—by whatsoever name you may know it—was being entertained; but after the conference had assembled some influences of which we are not advised were brought to bear, and they were sufficiently potential to divert the conference from its original purposes and to bring before it for consideration matters never dreamed of by the Senate when it passed the resolution asking that steps should be taken looking toward disarmament.

Having involved us in negotiations which had nothing to do in a legitimate way with disarmament, our friends were able to secure a treaty which every man with common sense knows in his heart is a quadruple alliance. As a part of that plan they have produced a scheme of disarmament coupled with a scheme for yielding to Japan and Great Britain the dominance of islands and potential naval bases which leave us in a position bordering upon helplessness; and I challenge the Members of our body who were members of this conference to produce to the Senate the confidential reports made to them regarding the relative strength of the navies of Great Britain, Japan, and the United States as those navies will stand when these treaties become effective.

The argument that the present treaty is nothing but a pledge to meet and confer, with no binding qualities and with no obligations which any nation is bound to observe, in itself is a manifest absurdity. If we are bound to do nothing, either in honor, by implication, or by express words, then we are signing a paper which is a mere nullity. We are doing something which might just as well not be done. If all that we agree to do, either morally or legally, by direction or by indirection, is to sit down and talk matters over, whereupon no nation is bound to try to reach an agreement and then to carry that agreement into effect, we are doing the most absurd thing ever performed by sensible men. Such an agreement is a mere cipher. It is nothing whatever. It gives no security, for it makes no promises. It gives no strength, for there is no binding force to it. It accomplishes nothing, because it agrees to do nothing.

That construction is an afterthought, and I charge it; for when this treaty was first proposed members of this commission uniformly talked of it in a different language. Some of them have asserted that it was the equivalent of article 10 of the League of Nations covenant. Some of them, in different language, which I shall quote, have expressly asserted it to be a treaty of great power and great force.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. REED. I think I ought to yield first to the Senator from Georgia, who rose a moment ago.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not want to pursue any inquiry if the Senator is going to pursue the matter of which he is speaking; but it seemed to me of such very extraordinary importance that I think the Senator ought to continue and we ought to know if members of the American delegation expressed the view of which the Senator now speaks.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I rose to remind the Senator from Missouri that the first speech prepared, written, and read in this Chamber by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] expressly stated repeatedly that this was an association of nations. Then the Senator's colleague [Mr. SPENCER] yesterday afternoon read a speech, in which he said it was an alliance to confer, and nothing more; and by the time the discussion reached the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] the dilution had gone to the point that it could not do us any harm. That is the gradation.

Mr. REED. Of course, if it can not do any harm it can not do any good, because it either is true that it can do no harm because we agree to do nothing or else the statement is wholly inaccurate. If we agree to do something, then we agree to do all that may be the result of the consultation of these nations. If we agree to do nothing, of course it will do no harm except to lull nations to sleep and leave us to place our confidence in an agreement which will bring us no results, and at the same time to concede, through these four treaties, matters of the gravest importance.

If this treaty means nothing, the other treaties mean much.

First, we agree to yield to England and Japan something like 26,000 islands in the Pacific Ocean, some of which are mere rocks but a vast number of which can be used for airplane bases and airplane landings. Many of them can be used for naval bases and for fortifications. We yield them forever, and England and Japan take possession forever and a day. That they get out of these treaties.

Second, we agree that we will not fortify Guam or Wake, or further fortify the Philippines. As a result the Philippines will be helpless and can be taken in three days' time, according to the testimony of every naval officer with whom I have been able to confer. Guam, according to the best evidence, can be taken in 24 hours' time. Therefore if this four-power pact binds us to nothing and binds them to nothing, the other treaties yield to them substantial advantages and place us in a position where we can be attacked in our possessions. We can expect no security to ourselves from the four-power pact, because it is a cipher.

In other words, to state it in plain language and using a homely illustration, we are situated exactly as we would be if a body of citizens were at enmity and at war with a body of other citizens and they were to sign an agreement that they would settle their differences in a certain way, and yet, having understood that that agreement amounted to nothing and that no settlement was binding, then one side were to disarm itself upon the strength of an agreement which was a nullity.

Not a single vessel of the United States can go to the Philippines to protect them and fight a battle in their defense and return to the coast of the United States or to the Hawaiian Islands unless there is, either in the Philippines or at Guam, a coaling base, a naval station; but the Philippines to-day can be attacked and taken, as I have said, in 3 days' time, and Guam can be taken in 24 hours' time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. In a moment. So we are placing ourselves in a position where we can not defend our possessions. At the same time you tell us that you are giving us a treaty that means nothing, that binds us to nothing, and binds them to nothing. That is the situation you are presenting to the people of the United States to-day.

I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely wish to ask the Senator with reference to a previous observation he made, that we are yielding some 25,000 or more islands. I want to know what he understood to be our interest in those islands.

Mr. REED. I do not care to go into that, because it is a digression, but I will answer the question. I understand that when those islands were surrendered by Germany they were surrendered to Germany's enemies, and we were one of Germany's enemies. I understand that if Japan and France and Great Britain got together and agreed to divide those islands among themselves, and did it without consulting us, it was an act of betrayal so base that it can not be characterized in parliamentary language.

What right did they have to meet and divide those islands? What kind of treatment of the United States was that, when we had stood by them through the late war, when we had stood by them until they had exacted the very terms of surrender they wanted? Is that the sort of Punic faith that is to be observed in this treaty? Quibbles about law, quibbles about whether we are tenants in common or tenants at will, quibbles about whether we got our rights under the Versailles treaty, which we did not sign, or whether we got them at war—what do those quibbles amount to when you are presumed to be dealing with your associates in a great and tragic struggle, and when the good faith, the very soul, of a nation is pledged? If they quibbled then, they will quibble in the future. If they sought refuge behind subterfuges then, they will seek such refuge in the future. We stand here confirming an act of perfidy and betrayal by the instruments we have already signed. We are asked to trust to the good faith of nations which, to use a common expression, "double-crossed" us before we went into the war, "double-crossed" us while we were in the war, secretly and perfidiously.

Their diplomats now come here with smiles on their countenances, our agents ratify that act, and we sit here ratifying it.

These things were done in secret, behind locked doors. They were kept from the President of the United States. They were kept from the people of the respective nations. They were concealed from the people of this country; yet we are asked to rely upon an agreement which Senators say means nothing, and to yield to them these advantages.

Let me just for one moment ask Senators to look at the map hanging on the wall of this Chamber. They can locate there with the eye the Hawaiian Islands, the square group to the left. A little farther on are Wake and Guam, then the Philippines shown to the extreme left, without a fortification which can withstand a real attack, with land which can be occupied so that the fortifications can be attacked from the rear, with Japan close at hand, and Japan with every point of land fortified.

Then observe the yellow squares to the left, which represent Japan and her holdings. She has fortified every important point along her coasts. She can fight her ships in her own seas, under the guns of her own forts, and if we undertake to go there to attack her we shall be out of coal before we can get back to the United States. Every Japanese seaman knows that, every Japanese statesman knows it, the Japanese laborers know it, but apparently our representatives disregarded it.

Go a little farther south. I have not time to point it out, but the red on the map indicates the possessions of Great Britain, and the red spots, which look as if red smallpox—if there were such a thing—had broken out all over the Pacific Ocean, represent Great Britain's islands. There is not a single gateway in the waters of the Seven Seas which is not controlled by the guns of Great Britain's fortresses. There is not a single tactical or strategic point she does not control.

When you go to the Atlantic look over opposite the Panama Canal at the red spots which indicate England's islands. There is the cordon of England's islands commanding the canal, and the nearest important island to it you will see in red, the island of Jamaica.

North of the main islands of Japan lies the island of Sakhalin. We had a witty gentleman on the floor the other day who sneeringly talked about Russians crossing over on the ice. Napoleon Bonaparte found that the Russians could fight on the ice and in the snow. Five miles across, Japan is already in the possession of Russia's part of that island. Russia will be forced to attack that island if she has a war with Japan. According to the best evidences we have to-day, she is moving her troops in that direction now. Possibly before the snow flies again the Russian will be at grips with the Japanese, and the moment a Russian soldier puts his foot on that Sakhalin Island, then, under the terms of this treaty, we shall be bound to do something. The proponents of this treaty say we will be bound to do nothing except to talk.

I say that that is the silliest talk which ever fell from the lips of sensible men. We are making an agreement to do something, and yet we are agreeing to do nothing! That was not the construction placed upon this instrument when it was being written. It was not the construction placed upon this instrument by the statesmen who spoke of it.

We had a specimen of misrepresentation here the other day. Of course, it was inadvertent. Of course, it was not intended. We had three or four sentences read out of the speech of M. Viviani at the Disarmament Conference. I assert that Viviani's speech, properly read, demonstrates that he understands this to be an alliance of the powers, and that the words read from his speech were carefully selected and did not represent his sentiments, but represented the exact converse of what he really meant. Let me read M. Viviani's speech, which is very short. I will omit the polite French compliments which this great Frenchman passed to Mr. LODGE. He spoke of Mr. LODGE'S speech as "an analysis at once so simple and so powerful." Of course, you would expect the Frenchman to say that much to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, but notice what follows:

> The moment that the final ratifications have been exchanged here, France will assume the obligations growing out of this pact just as she will exercise the rights conferred on her by it.

He thought there were obligations, did he not?

> Amid this gathering of nations whose custom it is to honor their signature I am entitled to say, speaking of this treaty, that France is in her rightful place here—France, who throughout the entire course of her history has scrupulously fulfilled her obligations and only a few years since offered up the blood of her sons that her plighted word might be kept.

He thought it was an obligation, did he not? You did not hear any of this foolish babble about the treaty amounting to nothing when he was talking. Notice what follows:

> We have been enlightened as to the juridical and diplomatic value of this agreement by the simple words of Mr. LODGE'S analysis. It is fitting, however, to pause a moment if only to mark the unity of our purpose. We fully understand that four great powers bind themselves to respect their mutual rights as far as the islands and dominions of the Pacific are concerned; we understand that if some controversy should loom up on the horizon which can not be settled through the ordinary workings of diplomacy these powers shall take counsel together; we understand that should the rights of these powers be imperiled by the aggressive action of another power measures would be taken to meet this situation.

What kind of measures? Getting together and passing a resolution? Holding a pink tea, when the waters of the Pacific are invaded by a hostile fleet? Twiddling thumbs or drinking highballs? Is that the sort of action you take when a hostile navy is bearing down upon you? Is that the course which nations follow? Shame upon men who would make such an argument! Let those who stand for this treaty have the honesty to confront the American people and say it is a treaty, just as Viviani said it was, under which we understand we will keep the faith, and that we understand that should the rights of these powers be imperiled by the aggressive action of another power, measures would be taken to meet the situation. I say it is sheer dishonesty to claim anything else. It is pusillanimous dishonesty to claim anything else. Mr. Viviani continues:

> The treaty provides for a duration of 10 years. At the moment of its ratification the Anglo-Japanese alliance comes to an end.

So much for the juridical value of this document. So much for the legal obligations of this document. So much for the binding force of this document. Then said the orator:

> We should, however, be remiss indeed—we should be slighting the open-handed and sumptuous hospitality offered us by America and failing in our manifest duty if we did not attempt to stress the moral worth of the agreement and thereby give this memorable day its true historic character. This moral value has just been alluded to by Mr. LODGE; he has pointed out that when four great powers are determined that peace shall prevail in a given part of the world, the concert of these powers, without provision for naval or military action, is all that is needed to assure the preservation, the guaranty, and the protection of that peace; and I say here, in this illustrious hall, in this tribune so exalted, that however feeble may be the voice speaking here it will be heard throughout the universe, that it is a good thing that this example of cohesion has been given to the world.

Now what does he say? He says that the treaty means a certain thing, that it is of binding force, that it does bind us to meet and consult and to contrive the measures to meet an attack, but, in addition to that, it has a high moral value. Very far is he from saying that it is not an instrument binding us to act, binding us to use force. On the contrary, his words expressly foreshadow and mean the application of force. He says there is a moral weight to it, too, and, of course, there is. Yet that speech was distorted here on the floor, distorted, I suppose, and sent to the people of the country with the assurance that Mr. Viviani had said there was nothing here but the moral value of four great nations agreeing to be friendly.

Now, I will proceed to read what some others said at that time. Before, in order to save the treaty, it was necessary to deny its virtue and its force, and such an opposition had begun to spring up as made it necessary to repudiate the meaning of the treaty in order to have it adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that Mr. Viviani, who is, in addition to being an eloquent man, a learned man, appreciates the difference between the juridical question and the moral question or matter of honor. He speaks of the obligation to which the Senator has called attention, and which the Senator insists imposes a legal obligation, as coming within the category of juridical or legal obligations. Then he proceeds to the moral considerations. So he considers the obligation there involved, in the words which the Senator read, first as being juridical, as binding as a legal obligation, and then he proceeds to a discussion of the moral aspect of the case. So it is a juridical legally binding instrument as well as a moral one.

Mr. REED. If one will read it in the light of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts which just preceded it, in which that Senator undertook to sugar-coat this pill so the American people would swallow it thinking they were getting pure candy, it is perfectly plain that this great French statesman meant to place on record a clear and concise statement of disagreement to any such construction as might be gotten out of Senator LODGE'S words.

He spoke of that Senator in flattering terms, complimenting him for his speech, but nevertheless took pains to say there is a juridical question here, and this is what we have agreed to in solemn form, so that if a controversy were to arise in the future and France were to call upon us to do something, if we were to say, "This treaty means nothing; Senator LODGE said something that could be construed in that way," the French statesmen of that hour would rise and read the words of M. Viviani, in which he said that it is a juridical document and contains juridical obligations. France could then say, "Our representative, M. Viviani, in that day challenged attention to the fact and no man gainsaid him."

Again I call attention to the statement of Baron Hayashi, who is the Japanese ambassador to Great Britain, as contained in an Associated Press dispatch of December 12:

> The new pact is but an enlargement and indorsement of the old friendship between Great Britain and Japan, which will come as a welcome Christmas present to the world. The spirit of the old alliance, which has achieved such fine work, will continue, and the cooperation of the United States enables us to face the future with calm assurance.

What was the old pact to which he referred? It was the Japanese-British alliance, an offensive and defensive alliance, so construed and understood by all the world, an alliance which some of us feared, an alliance of so grave a character that we are now told the only reason for making this treaty or the chief reason for it is to get rid of that alliance. That is, we get rid of it by becoming a party to it. We get rid of it just like the old woman got rid of the old man, by marrying him.

Here stand the proponents of these treaties in this absurd position. They say that the Japanese alliance was a thing of such moment that we must get rid of it, therefore we can afford to make this treaty in order to get rid of it. They then tell us that Japan took a treaty that meant nothing, bound us to nothing, in lieu of the treaty that bound to Japan the great British Empire, with her fleets and her armies, and bound her with chains of steel. They tell us that absurd and ridiculous thing, with the statement of Japan declaring that "the new pact is but an enlargement and indorsement of the old friendship between Great Britain and Japan, which will come as a welcome Christmas present to the world," and that "the spirit of the old alliance which has achieved such fine work will continue and the cooperation of the United States enables us to face the future with calm assurance."

Had the other alliance worked finely? Indeed it had. It enabled Japan to take Korea by the throat. It enabled her to overwhelm Russia. It enabled her to strengthen her army and her navy and to take a position among the first-class nations of the world. The old pact had worked so well that when Japanese soldiers invaded the mainland of Russia on one side, British soldiers went in on the other side.

Mr. President, these are not the only two men who have spoken on this matter. Mr. Balfour said:

Now, I am perfectly well aware that the treaty between Great Britain and Japan has been the cause of much searchings of heart, of some suspicions, of a good deal of animadversion in important sections of opinion in the United States.

I pause to inquire, if that caused searchings of our heart, what will the four-power pact do to the rest of the world that is left out of it? Notwithstanding the claim that we are tied to England by blood, though some people of this country would have us tied to her by political bonds, for there are tories to-day as there have always been tories, if a Japanese-English alliance alarms us and creates suspicions in our heart, what will this four-power pact do to the rest of the world?

I think that from the historical point of view that attitude may at first cause surprise, for certainly nothing was further from the thoughts of the original framers of the treaty between Japan and Great Britain than that it could touch in the remotest way, either for good or for evil, the interests of the United States. The United States seemed as remote from any subject touched in the original agreement as Chile or Peru.

If that is true, if those words were spoken in good faith, will some Senator rise in his place and tell us what we are getting by this treaty? If we were getting the abrogation of a treaty that never was intended to affect our interests adversely, if we were getting the abrogation of a treaty that never contemplated an attack upon the United States, will some one tell me what we are getting out of this bargain? How can Senators stand here and pretend we are escaping a menace and at the same time concede the truth of Mr. Balfour's words that the Japanese-British treaty was never intended to affect the United States?

Even at the risk of repetition I say that if England would have joined with Japan against us in a causeless war—and they will never have a war with good cause with us—if those two nations would attack us after our blood had been spilled in their defense, if the blood bond would not hold them, then will some one tell me what ink upon a piece of perishable parchment will do and of what binding effect it would be? If your heart is so black, if your soul is so debased, that you are ready to murder your neighbor without cause, your neighbor who has sustained you and protected you and poured out his blood for you, then no agreement signed will give you security.

But I continue to read:

When two great nations have been united in that fiery ordeal—

Referring to the war—

they can not at the end of it take off their hats one to the other and politely part as two strangers part who travel together for a few hours in a railway train. Something more, something closer, unites them than the mere words of the treaty; and, as it were, gratuitously and without a cause to tear up the written contract, although it serves no longer any valid or effective purpose, may lead to misunderstandings in one nation just as much as the maintenance of that treaty has led to misunderstandings in another.

That is Mr. Balfour's statement. It is not very pointed, so far as the particular question I am discussing is concerned, but read properly it is a clear indication on Mr. Balfour's part that the United States and Great Britain and Japan are to form a closer union and the purposes of that closer union are written in the document, and one of the terms of that document is that whenever the waters of the Pacific are invaded by a hostile fleet or the islands attacked, which is the same thing, then they will consult together and take action or with reference to the action to be taken.

Prince Tokugawa said:

The terms of the important pact assuring mutual security and friendship have just been made known. It is needless for me to say that all Japan will approve the consummation of this work. Japan will rejoice in this pledge of peace upon the Pacific.

What is the "mutual security"? Is there any "mutual security" in passing a resolution? Is there any "mutual security" in meeting and talking a matter over and agreeing to do something, and nobody to be bound to do it? Is it "mutual security," or is it tommyrot and foolishness? The "mutual security" is the security that comes out of the agreement we signed, and that agreement is that we will consult together and will devise the best means to repel an attack.

Senator Schanzer, speaking for the Italian delegation, said:

Any measure aiming at the creation of guaranties for the safeguard of peace in the world can not but meet with our fullest consent.

"Guaranties" of the peace of the world!

The principles involved in the agreement are entirely in accordance with the main lines of policy inspired by the high aim of the peaceful elimination of conflicts between nations.

We therefore express our full confidence that this agreement will represent the most firm and lasting guaranties for the safeguarding of peace in the Pacific.

Yet Senators say there is no guaranty; that we agree to nothing; that we are indulging in an empty form; that the treaty is a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal; that it imposes no obligation and it in no respect binds any nation to do anything; but, speaking with reference to it, the representative of Italy declared that it was a guaranty.

Viscount d'Alte, of Portugal, said:

It would, of course, be easy to evade any of the clauses of the treaty of which I am speaking; it would even seem as if the men who have drafted it have tried to signify that they did not place their main reliance and the achievement of their aims in a long series of carefully worded clauses. Only four powers, who repose the most implicit trust in the honor and integrity of each other, could sign a treaty such as this. And it is this fact that gives the agreement its tremendous binding power. The confidence so fully given no nation would dare to betray.

But already on this floor we are told that we have agreed to do nothing; already we are breaking the spirit of these words and violating the very ethics laid down by this Portuguese statesman. We are doing it here, but when we come to the council table of the four nations, what representative of the American people will dare assume the attitude of the coward and the poltroon and—I will use the slang term—the "welcher," and say, "We agreed to sit down with you; we agreed to devise the best plans of defense; but now we say to you that that is all we are going to do; we will not act in accordance with the manifest interests of the four powers concerned." That much, Mr. President, in reply to some of the statements which have been made here.

Now, I challenge the attention of those Senators who have yet an interest in these treaties and in their country to a statement regarding the condition in which our Navy is left. If I am not seriously mistaken, this demands the most careful consideration by every Member of this body. I have already challenged attention to the fact that the naval bases are in the hands of Japan and Great Britain, France holding some. We are substantially and practically without them in all the waters of the ocean. I do not mean to say that we have none, but those we have are so inefficient, so small, and so scattered that they scarcely need be referred to. A fleet with an abundance of naval bases starts out in any war with an infinite advantage over the nation that has no bases, no fortresses, no coaling stations, for her fleet can be made much more efficient thereby.

Among other things, the treaty provides: (1) That for a period of 10 years, with the exception of two vessels for the United States and two for Great Britain, there shall be no further construction of capital ships.

(2) With the exception above stated, all capital shipbuilding programs, either actual or projected, are to be abandoned.

(3) Further reduction is to be made by the scrapping of certain of the older ships.

(4) Capital ship tonnage is to be used as the measurement of the strength for navies.

Under the treaty the United States in effect agrees (1) to scrap 7 battleships and 6 battle cruisers, of 520,200 tons; (2) to scrap 17 of the older battleships, of 267,740 tons; or a total of 30 capital ships, of an aggregate tonnage of 787,940 tons, which are to be scrapped.

Of the 13 vessels mentioned in the first group to be scrapped, 1 battleship, the West Virginia, has already been launched. It is, of course, a new vessel. Six battleships and 6 battle cruisers are in process of construction. Let me here call attention to the fact that we are scrapping vessels upon which construction has already begun, which are from 30 to 60 per cent completed, and upon which we have expended $650,000,000. On the other hand—and I challenge the attention of Senators to this statement—Great Britain is scrapping no vessels whose construction has been begun, but is agreeing not to build two ships which she had planned to build and on which no work has been done. They are, as has been suggested, paper ships.

The Japanese agreement includes both classes. Some of their vessels are actually begun, while on others which they agree not to construct no work at all has been done; but they were used to trade with just the same.

The 17 older American ships mentioned in the second group are all in existence. Two of them, however, the Maine and the Missouri, of 12,500 tons each, are not on the active list. Eliminating these two, the total tonnage to be scrapped by the United States amounts to 762,940.

Great Britain agrees not to build two battle cruisers heretofore contemplated, the keels of which have not been laid down, aggregating 86,000 tons, and to scrap 24 of her older battleships. The 24 ships to be scrapped are as follows:

King George V, Ajax, Centurion, Thunderer, New Zealand, Lion, Princess Royal, Conqueror, Monarch, Orion, Australia, Agincourt, Erin, Commonwealth, Dreadnought, Bellerophon, St. Vincent, Inflexible, Superb, Neptune, Hercules, Indomitable, Temeraire, Agamemnon.

Of the ships above referred to, the first four, namely, the King George V, the Ajax, the Centurion, and the Thunderer are the only ships of the 24 on the active list. The remaining ships are all tied up at the docks and have all been offered for disposal at public sale. By scrapping them, therefore, Great Britain loses nothing. She is still at liberty to sell them, as she contemplated before the Limitation of Arms Conference was called.

Japan agrees (1) not to build 4 battleships and 4 battle cruisers the keels of which had not been laid down by November 11, 1921, aggregating 364,000 tons; (2) to scrap 2 of the new battleships and 4 of the new battle cruisers, aggregating 255,200 tons; (3) to scrap 11 of the older battleships, aggregating 163,932 tons; or a total of 17 capital ships, of 419,132 tons.

(a) The keels of none of the four battle cruisers mentioned in the first group which Japan agrees not to build had been laid on November 11, 1921. It is true, however, that while the conference was in progress Japan by rush work laid down the keels of two of the battleships. This was so manifestly a threat as to require no comment.

(b) Of the six battleships mentioned in the second group actually to be scrapped two battleships are in process of construction, two battle cruisers are in process of construction, and two battle cruisers had not had their keels laid by November 11, 1921.

(c) The 11 older ships mentioned in the third group are all now in existence. Japan is to be credited with scrapping 11 battleships actually in use. As a matter of fact, however, 3 of these, the Kurama, the Ibuki, and the Ikoma, until now have been classed merely as first-class cruisers. My authority for that is Janes's "Fighting Ships." Deducting these 3 vessels leaves but 8 vessels of a total of 120,982 tons, which, with the 4 vessels in process of construction which are to be scrapped, amounting to 168,200 tons, gives a total of 12 capital ships, of 289,182 tons, to be scrapped by Japan.

I desire now to give the summary.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McNary	Smoot
Ball	Harris	Myers	Spencer
Borah	Harrison	Nelson	Stanfield
Broussard	Heflin	New	Sterling
Calder	Hitchcock	Nicholson	Sutherland
Cameron	Johnson	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Underwood
Caraway	Kellogg	Overman	Wadsworth
Colt	Kendrick	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	King	Phipps	Warren
du Pont	Ladd	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Ernst	La Follette	Ransdell	Weller
Fernald	Lenroot	Rawson	Williams
Fletcher	McCormick	Reed	Willis
France	McKellar	Sheppard
Glass	McKinley	Shields
Gooding	McLean	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it appears, therefore, that of the capital ships now carried on the active lists of these three nations and of the capital ships in actual process of construction on November 11, 1921, the tonnage to be scrapped by these nations is as follows—and I wish Senators would notice these figures:

	Tons.
The United States	762,940
Great Britain	92,000
Japan	289,182

It would be interesting to know why Great Britain is credited with scrapping 24 capital ships, 20 of which are obsolete, offered for sale, and, in fact, already scrapped, and why Japan is credited with scrapping 3 capital ships which are not actually capital ships. Is it merely an attempt to pad the lists in order to make a presentable appearance against that of the United States?

If the treaty is ratified, the navies of these three powers are to be reduced to the following basis:

(a) The United States, 18 capital ships, 525,000 tons.

(b) Great Britain, 20 capital ships, 525,000 tons.

(c) Japan, 10 capital ships, 315,000 tons.

The foregoing demonstrates that the United States is required to scrap 7 battleships and 6 battle cruisers in process of construction, against 2 battleships and 2 battle cruisers for Japan and none for England. The United States is also required to scrap 17 older battleships, as against 8 for Japan and 4 for Great Britain. In other words, the United States is to scrap 30 capital ships, 17 of which are in the water, able to fight, and 13 new vessels in process of construction and upon which she has already expended over $650,000,000, as against Japan scrapping 8 in the water, able to fight, and 4 new vessels in process of construction, and against Great Britain scrapping 4 of her older vessels now in active service, the remaining 20 of the total of 24 having, as heretofore stated, been offered for sale—that is, scrapped.

Somebody put something over on these delegates of ours, one of whom said that the strategic value of the islands had not even been considered. Evidently the fighting strength of the Navy was not considered. The fastest of our vessels go at 21 knots an hour. Notice the armament of the ships. We have three ships armed with 16-inch guns. All the rest of our ships except four are armed with 14-inch guns.

If the treaty is ratified, the particular capital ships eventually allowed to these three navies are as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess for 20 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona moves that the Senate take a recess for 20 minutes. [Putting the question.] The motion is lost.

Mr. REED. It is singular how it was lost, as there are only two Senators present on the other side, and only one of them voted; but I will proceed. In view of that ruling I think I ought to go on.

Great Britain has one ship of 41,200 tons, the Hood. She has two super-Hoods of 35,000 tons. She has the Renown and the Repulse, of 26,500 tons; the Tiger, of 28,500 tons; the Royal Sovereign, the Royal Oak, the Resolution, the Revenge, and the Ramillies, of 25,750 tons; the Queen Elizabeth, the Warspite, the Barham, the Valiant, and the Malaya, of 27,500 tons; the Benbow, the Emperor of India, the Iron Duke, and the Marlborough, of 25,000 tons. Notice how they outrank us in size.

Now, we come to the question of speed. The Hood has a speed of 31 knots an hour; the two super-Hoods, 29 knots; the Tiger, 29 knots; the five vessels—the Queen Elizabeth, the Warspite, the Barham, the Valiant, and the Malaya—25 knots. All the rest of her vessels have a speed of 22 knots, so that they outrank us in speed as they do in size.

Now, I come to the question of the caliber of the guns. She has two vessels equipped with 16-inch guns, and all the rest of her vessels, I believe, except two, are armed with 15-inch guns.

The same disparity between the two fleets appears in the matter of broadsides of metal thrown. It is to be noted that the Renown and the Repulse are classified as 26,500-ton vessels. Those vessels when built were so classified. They then had a belt of side armor of 6 inches; but the 6-inch armor belt of the Repulse has already been replaced by a 9-inch belt, and under chapter 2, part 3, section 1(d)(2) of the naval treaty, the same refitting is now being done on the Renown, and is to be completed. No allowance for these changes in the displacement allowance is made, although the defense of the vessels is thereby enormously increased.

Mr. President, Japan has four battle cruisers, with a displacement of 27,500 tons, and a speed of 27½ knots. She has two battle cruisers of 33,800 tons, with a speed of 23 knots. She has two battleships of 31,260 tons, with a speed of 23 knots. She has two of 30,600 tons, and a speed of 22 knots.

Those vessels are armed principally with 14 and 16 inch guns. I print a table displaying accurately the strength of each vessel, its speed, and its armament, as follows:

Japan.

Vessels bracketed are sister ships.
First figures under "Armor over vital parts" are for belt and second for turrets.
The Setsu is omitted from the above table because the Mutsu is now completed and the Setsu is to be scrapped.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in what class among those vessels is the Mutsu?

Mr. REED. It is not listed in this table, but it has a displacement of 33,800 tons.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Probably it was not listed among those referred to when Secretary Hughes made his first announcement.

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Afterwards, I understand, the Japanese persuaded him and our delegation to allow them to include the Mutsu, which, under his original proposal, was among those to be scrapped.

Mr. REED. I think I cover that later. I remember dictating a statement in regard to it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand it is the most powerful battle vessel in the world.

Mr. REED. It is understood that when completed it will be one of the most powerful ships in existence. The foregoing figures are taken from "Janes's Fighting Ships" and are exactly reproduced in the tables. Now, I call attention to a very important matter. It should be noted that Great Britain's tonnage figures are arrived at on a different basis from that by which the corresponding figures for our own ships are arrived at, the distinction being that when British ships go for a trial after being built they have aboard just enough fuel and stores to make the run. They do not carry spare oil, water, or sea stores, which they would have aboard in normal commissioned status. On the other hand, when American vessels make their trial runs they carry a full allowance of everything which they would take to sea in actual service. The result is that the tonnage of British ships is shown to be less than the tonnage of the identical American ships. An average of a number of instances has led to the conclusion that one-eighth of the listed tonnage of British vessels should be added to their displacement in comparing them with similar American ships. That is to say, an American ship of 30,000 tons would, in the case of an identical British ship, estimated by the British method, show a vessel of 26,600 tons. In order, therefore, to compare the tonnage of American ships as given in the table with British ships as given in the table we must add one-eighth, or 12½ per cent, to the British tonnage.

Accordingly, the total British tonnage allowed by the treaty as to existing ships will be 628,820 tons, as against America's 525,860 tons, a difference of 20 per cent in favor of Great Britain.

That fact has been concealed from the American people, whether designedly or stupidly I do not know. I charge it to be a fact, and I charge it to be an act of unspeakable perfidy to thus deceive the American people and the American Congress.

That the foregoing statements are accurate is further shown by the fact that in the treaty it is recited that—a vessel completed hereafter shall be rated at its displacement tonnage when in the standard condition defined herein.

The standard is laid down in paragraph 2, part 4, at the end of chapter 2. It will be observed, therefore, that as to existing tonnage Great Britain has an advantage of over 100,000 tons over the United States.

The Japanese follow the English method of measurement. We must, therefore, add to the Japanese tonnage one-eighth, or 12½ per cent, which raises the tonnage of Japan from 341,320 tons to 383,985 tons, creating the same proportion of disparity as exists between the ships of Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. KING. Would that give the United States, then, only 425,000 tons?

Mr. REED. It gives us 525,000 tons by our measure, but if we were to apply our measure to the British ships, they would have 628,820 tons.

The revised figures, therefore, as to the total tonnage are as follows:

	Tons.
Great Britain	628,820
United States	525,850
Japan	383,985

That is to say, the ships of Great Britain measured by the American rule and the American ships measured by the same rule give the results I have just stated in figures.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. During the conference negotiations, and during the meetings of the experts of the respective signatories to the treaties, when they were agreeing upon a limitation and setting forth the relative strength of each nation, was there not something produced which evidenced the discrepancy to which the Senator refers?

Mr. REED. I can not answer, but I am informed that there was a confidential statement made by some of our naval experts with reference to these fleets; that there were only about a dozen copies of it ever made, and those copies have never been made public. What our naval experts said further than that I can not say. Manifestly, we are all in the dark. We went into this conference with the Senator from Massachusetts protesting against the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in favor of open sessions throughout. Finally the Harrison resolution, as I will denominate it, was passed with some amendments, and evidently for the purpose of keeping outside of the terms of that resolution they proceeded to keep no records. They met and agreed, and when they had something agreed upon, they wrote out the final conclusion in the form of a treaty, they came into a plenary session to which the public was graciously invited, and they told to the public what they had done, but not how they had done it, nor what evidence they had before them. Nothing was there of the character produced from the Versailles conference, where they did have what they called a procès verbal, which contained at least minutes of the various conferences.

This, I charge, was designedly the most secret conference which has been held between nations within the last 10 years, unless we except the time when France and England and Japan got together and agreed to divide up the possessions they intended to take from Germany, and they were concealing that from us.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I am at an utter loss to understand how there could be any misunderstanding as to the tonnage of Great Britain or Japan or the United States or any of the participating powers, because, as the Senator knows, for a number of years there has been available a vast amount of literature as to the tonnage of each nation. We know that just as soon as a ship is built in Great Britain, in Germany, or in the United States the tonnage, the size and the caliber of the guns, their range, and so forth, are known, and why our representatives here did not know of the tonnage of the nations and of these ships, and how such a discrepancy as the Senator has indicated could arise, is something which surpasses my comprehension.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator was out when I made that plain. Great Britain measures her ships when they are practically without a load. We measure our ships when they are loaded, ready for a cruise. Tonnage is estimated by the amount of water displaced. Two ships of exactly the same size placed upon the surface of the water, one of them loaded and the other unloaded, will show a great difference in tonnage. All of our figures of tonnage have been published, but they have been published according to the American method of estimating. All of the British figures have been published, but they have been published according to the British method of estimating. So if we take the works that have been written in regard to the various navies of the world and find the tonnage of an American vessel given and the tonnage given of a vessel of exactly the same size which is a British vessel, we get a great discrepancy in those figures; but the man who takes the book and copies the figures and does not understand that there are different methods of measurement makes the mistake of concluding that the two vessels are equal in tonnage when they are not equal at all in size or in tonnage, either, if they were measured by the same standard.

The statements I have made are made upon the authority of an expert whose name I can not give, but we can get this testimony if we will have an investigation. There is no question about the verity of what I am saying.

Now I come to the question of battle cruisers, having compared the strength of battle fleets. Here are the battle cruisers and here is a comparative table:

GREAT BRITAIN.

Super-Hood; speed, 29 knots; guns, 12 16-inch caliber.
Second super-Hood; speed, 29 knots; guns, 12 16-inch caliber.
Hood; speed, 31 knots; guns, 8 15-inch caliber.
Renown; speed, 22 knots; guns, 8 15-inch caliber.
Repulse; speed, 28 knots; guns, 8 15-inch caliber.
Tiger; speed, 29 knots; guns, 8 15-inch caliber.
These great cruisers, all of them except two, have very high ratings.

JAPAN.

Kirishima; speed, 27½ knots; armed with 8 14-inch guns.
Haruna; speed, 27½ knots; armed with 8 14-inch guns.
Hiyei; speed, 27½ knots; armed with 8 14-inch guns.
Kongo; speed, 27½ knots; armed with 8 14-inch guns.

What has the United States? Absolutely nothing. We are required to scrap the six cruisers we were building which would have outrun and outshot any cruisers in the world. We enter upon this agreement without a single battle cruiser of any kind or character.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the reason why our delegates allowed every cruiser, which would seem to be the best fighting ship we have in case of war, to be scrapped? Why did they agree to scrap all our cruisers and then let England and Japan keep their cruisers?

Mr. REED. I can not tell the Senator any more than I can tell him why we give away all the islands in the Pacific, any more than I can tell him why we make an agreement in which we agree to do nothing, according to the construction placed on the treaty by those who stand here and tell us it is the most important treaty every proposed.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, is it not true that our Navy has been notoriously inferior because of our lack of cruisers? Is it not true that our present program was to make up that deficiency?

Mr. REED. Our present program was calculated to make up that deficiency. It was thought by our naval experts that they had designed a battle cruiser that would overmatch the battle cruisers of any other country. There is more in regard to the cruisers, to which I will call attention in a few moments. I am trying now, although figures are always dull and difficult to follow, to convince the Senate with these figures of the absolutely helpless condition in which this treaty will place the American Nation.

When we compare the battleships of the British Navy and the battleships of the American Navy, we find that on the battleships of the English Navy, on all her best vessels, the guns are larger in every instance except with reference to three of our vessels.

We have, it will be observed, four vessels armed only with 12-inch guns—the Arkansas, the Wyoming, the Utah, and the Florida. Vessels with 12-inch guns may be eliminated from consideration, for, as H. C. Bywater, a British naval engineer, states, the 12-inch gun is no longer considered equal to the tactical requirements of the near future. On page 14 of "Sea Power in the Pacific" he says:

> Capital ships armed with these guns have ceased to be reckoned as first-class fighting units.

According to the same author—

> Capital ships are now rated according to their heavy guns upon the following basis: First-class ships, guns of 15 inches or more; second-class ships, guns of 13½ to 14 inches; third-class ships, guns of 12 inches or less.

All of Great Britain's 20 capital ships, therefore, are or will be able to take their places on the line, while but 14 of the 18 United States ships can do so. Japan's entire fleet of 10 ships can also take its place in the first line. Of this American fleet of 14, but 3 are or will be of the first class based on gun power, the remaining 11 belonging to the second class. Of Japan's 10, 2 are of the first class and the other 8 of the second class. As against this Great Britain has or will have 15 first-class and 5 second-class ships. In tabular form it works out as follows, and I print the table:

Class.	First.	Second.	Third.
United States	3	11	4

In addition to this, of the 20 other ships the minimum speed is or will be 22 knots, the maximum 31. Of the 10 first and second class Japanese battle vessels, minimum speed is 22 knots, maximum 27½ knots. Of the 18 American first and second class vessels, the minimum speed is 20½ knots and the maximum speed 21 knots. It must be remembered that when fleets engage in combat each fleet generally strings out in single file. It is at once apparent that as a general proposition the fleet speed must be measured by the speed of the slowest vessel in the line. If the speed of the various ships in the three navies is compared we find that the slowest British ship has or will have a speed of at least 21 knots, the slowest American ship 20½ knots, and the slowest Japanese ship 22 knots. If the British fleet maintains all of its 20 vessels in line against our 18 ships she would have a fleet advantage of at least 1 knot an hour.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose we fail to ratify the four-power treaty, but ratify the naval disarmament treaty, what position would we be in, in that event, under the statement the Senator has just made?

Mr. REED. It is pretty difficult to answer that sort of a question as to which would be the worst of two bad things. My position is that the United States to-day is in a position to negotiate and to make proper treaties. We are not foreclosed by any blunders or mistakes that have been made, and now is the time to make the right kind of a bargain.

Mr. OVERMAN. A gentleman said to me that all these treaties are interdependent; that one rests upon the other. It looks as though that might be the case, according to the statements the Senator has made.

Mr. REED. I think not. I think we can make a treaty with regard to disarmament or reduction of armament without any difficulty. I will tell you why we can make it. We can make it because we have a lever that always has moved Great Britain. We have a greater power to-day than she has in the matter of building ships. We can, if we were compelled to do so, build three ships to her one. A nation that can not pay its interest to the United States and that can scarcely meet the expenses of its Government could not enter a naval race with the United States. As badly taxed as we are, we can nevertheless get the money. That does not mean that I am in favor of getting the money and building an enormous fleet, but it does mean that we are in a position to say to Great Britain: "We will make a reasonable agreement on limitation of armament. We will do everything that is fair; but if you do not accept a reasonable proposition, then we are in a position to take care of ourselves." And that is an argument that every Englishman can understand.

If we compare these first-class ships according to speed, we find the following state of affairs: The United States has three first-class ships with a maximum speed of 21 knots, Great Britain has four with a maximum speed of 29 knots, five with a maximum of 25, six with a maximum of 22, and Japan has two with a maximum speed of 23 knots. This disparity in speed would enable the British capital ships and all those of the Japanese to keep out of the range of the guns of our ships if they so desired. Their superior speed would give them the option of engaging our ships or of refusing, and also give them the ability to overtake any isolated vessel of our fleet.

In gun power, if we consider gun power as measured by large-caliber guns, we find a similar disparity. The United States will have three vessels armed with eight 16-inch guns. Their speed, however, will be but 21 knots and their displacement 32,600 tons. As against this Great Britain has or will have the two super-Hood battle cruisers with a speed of 29 knots and a displacement of 35,000 tons, and eight or ten 16-inch guns; also the battle cruiser Hood, with 31 knots, a displacement of 41,200 tons, and eight 15-inch guns. Japan has or will have two battleships, the Mutsu and the Nagato, each with a speed of 23 knots, a displacement of 32,500 tons, and eight 16-inch guns. If we eliminate these vessels as of comparative equal value, which, of course, is by no means true, we find that the remaining 15 American vessels which are able to take their places in the line are of the second class and armed with 14-inch guns, and the remaining 8 Japanese vessels are also of the second class and armed with 14-inch guns, while 12 of the British vessels are of the first class and have 15-inch guns, the remaining 5 being of the second class with 13½-inch guns.

At least 15 of the British vessels could outdistance and outshoot 15 of our 18 allotted vessels. By their superior speed they could select their range, and, while keeping out of range of our ships' guns, could still keep our ships within range of their guns. This would practically enable them to engage our vessels without any risk to their own.

All will remember the astonishment with which we found that Dewey had sunk the Spanish fleet at Manila and yet only one or two stray shells had struck an American ship; but the mystery was easily explained when we learned that our guns outranged the Spanish guns, and, accordingly, Dewey, very properly, stood off out of range of the Spanish guns and battered the Spanish fleet to pieces. The same thing occurred, as I understand, although here I do not speak by the card, in the battle between the Japanese fleet and the Russian fleet.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it happened also in the battle between the Japanese fleet and the Chinese fleet on the Yalu River; and that was the beginning of Japan's ascendancy.

Mr. REED. Yes. Of course, it is elementary, and yet it is worth while to state that a man with a rifle that will shoot 200 yards can stand off with perfect safety and fight all day with another man who is armed with a rifle that can shoot only 100 yards. Then, if he can run faster than the other man he can always preserve the distance between them, so that he can constantly be within killing range of the other man without a chance of himself being hurt at all. That is as true on the water as it is on the land.

Apart from the three ships of the Maryland class, which are equaled by the Hoods and super-Hoods, there is not a single ship in our allotted list to which the British can not oppose a vessel of superior speed and armed with larger guns, and still have two battle cruisers to spare.

It is also to be noted—indeed, it has already been noted—that we have no battle cruisers, which would mean that six British battle cruisers, with their tremendous speed and their 15 and 16 inch guns, could play havoc with any and all of our 15 slower and less heavily armed ships.

I might add that they could sweep our commerce from the seas, sinking every vessel, and we would have not a single vessel which could overtake them.

According to Lord Fisher, who really invented the battle cruiser, that type of ship armed and armored as heavily as a battleship, but with greater speed, is superior to the battleship. In all the naval engagements of the World War it was the battle cruiser that carried off the honors. Admiral Beatty's fleet was composed of vessels of this type. In the battle of Helgoland in August, 1914, it was the British battle cruiser in the squadron under Beatty that determined the result. In the battle of Falkland Islands, in December, 1914, it was the battle cruisers Invincible and Inflexible that put an end to Von Spee's squadron, which had preyed upon British commerce for months and had previously destroyed Admiral Craddock's British fleet.

In the Battle of Dogger Bank, in January, 1915, it was Beatty's squadron of five battle cruisers which won the day. This action particularly emphasized the importance of speed and long-range guns. In the Battle of Jutland it was Von Hipper and Beatty's British squadron of battle cruisers which did practically all the fighting, and developed all the strategy of the two main fleets. In spite of this the United States has no battle cruisers, and under this treaty has agreed not to build them. In this connection I ask consent to print in the RECORD a list of authorities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. Bywater, on page 118 of his recent book, says:

> The circumstance that the American Navy does not as yet possess a single battle cruiser * * * detracts very appreciably from its power and readiness for war * * * it is certain that the want of such ships would most seriously handicap the fleet in any warlike operation.

Lord Fisher says that—

> In the Great War the fast dreadnaught battle cruisers carried off all the honors.

The United States has actually on the ways six battleships in various stages of completion whose names and characteristics are as follows:

Lexington, Constitution, Constellation, Ranger, Saratoga, United States.

Displacement, 43,500 tons; speed each, 33½ knots; armament, 16-inch guns and torpedo tubes.

If those vessels had been built they would have outfooted any ship afloat; they would have been able to meet any battle cruiser on the water. They would have been able to protect our commerce against commerce destroyers; they would have been able to turn to flight in times of battle; they would have been able to have met and destroyed every slow laggard ship unless it was of the very first class of battle type. We are graciously permitted to complete and to convert two of these as aircraft carriers, but the tonnage is not to exceed 33,000. To meet this Great Britain is to be allowed to construct two of her super-Hoods as aircraft carriers with the same limitation as to tonnage.

It was stated by the late Admiral Mahan in his book on naval strategy that if the first-line ships of two powers are on a parity and one nation has a superiority over the other in second-line ships it would be the part of strategy to force an engagement of the first-line ships. By such an engagement the ships of the enemy might be destroyed or at least so damaged they would be compelled to resort to repairs and be removed from the fighting line for some time. Thereupon the second-line ships would automatically become ships of the first line, and the superiority in ships of this type would control the situation.

In view of this principle it is interesting to study the fleets of cruisers and other auxiliary vessels which by reason of the fact that there is no restriction in the treaty with reference to these types of vessels the signatories now possess or will possess when their proposed building programs are completed.

Mr. President, without reading I ask permission to print a table showing the smaller vessels of the type I am now discussing which the United States has and also a table of the vessels of similar type which Great Britain will have or has.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I trust the Senators will read the tables in the RECORD. It would be a waste of time to read them here, because they are composed of figures which must be studied; but when we are dealing with a question that may involve the very life of our Nation a little time might profitably be spent in looking over tables which show our strength or our weakness. But, commenting upon these figures, I have to say it may be seen at once that the two British cruisers—Courageous and Glorious—are indeed battle cruisers, though not classified under the treaty as such.

The treaty provides, in chapter 1, article 12, as follows:

No vessel of war of any of the contracting powers, hereafter laid down, other than a capital ship, shall carry a gun with a caliber in excess of 8 inches.

The words "hereafter laid down" in connection with chapter 1, article 11, which limits cruisers to a maximum of 10,000 tons, precludes any cruiser of more than 10,000 tons or carrying larger than 8-inch guns. By reason of these words, however, Great Britain is allowed to retain both the Courageous and the Glorious, and to class them as cruisers. They carry side armor of 3 inches, turret armor of 9 inches, are armed with four 15-inch guns and eighteen 4-inch guns, and steam 33 knots.

Lord Fisher, the real inventor of the battle cruiser, regarded these two cruisers and their sister ship, the Furious, now used as an airplane carrier, as he did the battle cruisers Renown and Repulse, classified under this treaty as capital ships. In the fight of Helgoland Bight in August, 1917, these two cruisers and the Repulse determined the outcome of the battle. I ask leave to print here a table of Japan's cruisers of the first line and cruisers of the second line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if cruisers are measured by displacement—and I should like Senators to realize this, because we can build no more large cruisers, but the cruisers of this class are allowed to be retained without restriction—we find, as the matter now stands, that the United States has 16 cruisers with an aggregate tonnage of 161,000 or 165,000; Great Britain has 60 cruisers, with a tonnage of 311,500; and Japan has 24 cruisers of this type, with a tonnage of 113,328. Of the cruisers which Great Britain has, 43 have been built since 1915, while the United States has but four built since that date and three built earlier than 1893, one of these dating back to 1885—old, obsolete, worthless craft—and but 16 of them against Great Britain's 60 modern cruisers of this type.

If these cruisers are compared on a tonnage basis, we find that of cruisers of 20,000 tons or over the United States has none, Great Britain has two, and Japan has none.

Of cruisers of 10,000 to 20,000 tons, the United States has eight, Great Britain four, and Japan none.

Of cruisers of 5,000 to 10,000 tons, the United States has 9, Great Britain has 9, and Japan has 15.

Of cruisers of 3,500 to 5,000 tons, the United States has 4, Great Britain has 40, and Japan has 9.

If we compare the caliber of the guns carried by the cruisers, we find the following to be true:

Of cruisers having 15-inch guns, the United States has none, Great Britain has two, and Japan none.

Of cruisers having 10-inch guns, the United States has three, and Great Britain and Japan have none.

Of cruisers having both 6 and 10 inch guns, the United States has 13, Great Britain 53, and Japan 16.

Of cruisers having 3 and 6 inch guns, the United States has five, Great Britain none, and Japan eight.

If we compare speed in the various cruisers, we get the following results:

Of cruisers of speed over 30 knots, the United States has four, Great Britain eight, and Japan eight.

Of cruisers of speed of from 28 to 30 knots, the United States has none, Great Britain has 40, and Japan none.

Of cruisers of speed of from 25 to 28 knots, the United States has none, Great Britain has four, and Japan three.

Of cruisers of speed of from 20 to 25 knots, the United States has 16, Great Britain 3, and Japan 13.

Of cruisers of speed under 20 knots, the United States has one, and the others have none as slow as that.

In other words, Great Britain has 48 cruisers of over 28 knots' speed, as against 4 of the United States and 8 of Japan.

Great Britain has 52 cruisers of 25 knots or over, as against 4 of the United States and 11 of Japan.

Coming now to aircraft carriers, Great Britain has seven aircraft carriers, the United States one—not complete—and Japan one. I print them in a table, with their speed and their armament and their aircraft-carrying capacity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. Coming now to merchant marine:

In the consideration of vessels designed for or adapted to use as fleet or fighting ships an examination of the merchant marine is most necessary.

Mr. Lasker, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, recently stated:

Granting that the 5–5–3 naval program, or some equivalent, be adopted, and that we have a naval holiday for a term of years, the question of naval equality is not solved; because if, in addition to the equalized navies, any one nation possesses a merchant marine of convertible strength vastly beyond that of another nation, the nation possessing that added convertible merchant tonnage has the preponderance of naval power.

As already stated, Mahan laid down the principle that the nation with the greatest naval reserve force of secondary or tertiary power will in the last analysis, when the ships of greater power are eliminated from the struggle, control the naval situation. In the application of this principle it is obvious that if a nation's capital ships, cruisers, and vessels designed for fighting are equal to those of another nation, the nation which possesses the greatest number of merchantmen convertible into fighting ships will have the advantage.

Chapter 1, article 14, of the proposed treaty provides:

No preparations shall be made in merchant ships in time of peace for the installation of warlike armaments for the purpose of converting such ships into vessels of war, other than the necessary stiffening of decks for the mounting of guns not exceeding 6-inch caliber.

It should be noted, therefore, that this treaty recognizes and impliedly approves the "installation of warlike armaments" upon peaceful merchantmen for the purpose of converting them into "vessels of war." The treaty merely provides that such installation and such conversion shall not be made in time of peace. However, the treaty provides that even in peace time the decks of vessels not previously so constructed may be made sufficiently strong to support 6-inch guns, the number of such guns not being provided for. The treaty, however, does not restrict merchant vessels as to the number of guns which may be carried, nor does it restrict such guns to a 6-inch caliber. An analysis of the merchant vessels possessed by the United States and of those possessed by Great Britain is therefore most illuminating.

The tonnage of the entire American merchant marine, according to the latest annual report of the Shipping Board, was 12,115,571. The tonnage of the British merchant marine was 16,916,664. The tonnage of the Japanese merchant marine was 2,132,601. I print a table setting forth a comparison of this tonnage.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Gross tonnage.	Number of vessels.[1]
	United States.	Great Britain.
15,000 and over	7	36
10,000 to 15,000	39	113
5,000 to 10,000	333	1,245
3,000 to 5,000	735	1,394
Total	1,114	2,788

[1] Lloyd's Register 1920-21, Vol. II, pp. 327, 346.

Mr. REED. In vessels of the 3,000-ton type or over which may be converted into war vessels, the ratio is over 2.25 to 1 in favor of Great Britain.

In vessels of 5,000 tons or over, the ratio is 3 to 1 in favor of Great Britain.

Taking into account vessels building in both countries, the ratio of vessels of 8,000 tons or over is 5 to 1 in favor of Great Britain.

Mr. Lasker on December 14, 1921, said:

When speed is considered, and speed is essential for naval purposes, the ratio is even more startling in favor of Great Britain; as of vessels of 22 knots and over she possesses 5, the United States only 1, a ratio of 5 to 1; in all vessels of 12 knots and over, which is the minimum speed useful for naval operations, she possesses 234, and the United States possesses only 53, a ratio of 4.4 to 1 in favor of Great Britain.

It is apparent, therefore, that the great advantage which Great Britain has over the United States in the number of merchant ships capable of conversion into vessels of war would insure Great Britain a superiority in naval power over the United States if the actual vessels of war possessed by these nations at all approximated equality. When this fact is taken in connection with the similar advantage which, under the terms of this treaty, is accorded to Great Britain over the United States in actual fighting ships, the superiority of Great Britain over the United States in naval power is tremendously increased.

Mr. President, if this treaty is ratified the American Navy will be left without any battle cruisers. This means that we will have no fast wings for quick operation or change of formation in time of battle, and no fast commerce destroyers of a heavy type, and no vessels able to meet the commerce destroyers of Great Britain. Great Britain and Japan are each left in possession of four ships of the character I am discussing.

In the matter of cruisers, as distinct from battle cruisers, the American Navy is practically helpless. The ones in our possession are old, weakly armed, and slow. Those in possession of Great Britain average in date of completion about 1917. The Japanese vessels average in date of completion about 1918.

Furthermore, we are distinctly inferior to the British in the number of merchant ships which may be employed in war. The use of such armed craft in future wars is openly forecast by the provision of the treaty allowing their decks to be strengthened to carry guns, even in time of peace. The disparity in merchant-ship tonnage appears even more dangerous when an examination of their classification shows that in large ships and in fast ships British superiority is even more pronounced than in the matter of total tonnage.

From what I have said it will be seen that the treaty takes cognizance only of the comparative tonnage of capital ships and aircraft carriers. It completely disregards all the other units just as valuable to the strength of a navy, such as cruiser forces and merchant marine; but, regarding the capital-ship tonnage alone, it is apparent that under a seeming equality there really exists a distinct inequality between the Navy which will be left to us and the one which will be left to Great Britain.

In the matter of aircraft carriers, Great Britain has at present nearly all of such vessels that there are in existence. The United States has only one slow-going collier, which is being converted and which is not yet completed. Japan has only one small merchantman, with no flying-off deck to it. France has one converted battleship, not yet completed. Great Britain has seven completed aircraft carriers which have been in service as long as four years. It is, therefore, the only nation which has had actual experience with this kind of craft; and although two of them are just recently completed, and are therefore to all intents and purposes new ships, Great Britain is to be allowed to count them as experimental craft and to replace them when it is found to be convenient.

Mr. President, I make no complaint that figures such as I have produced have not been listened to with patience by the Members of the Senate. They are problems to be studied with the figures upon paper before the student.

I make no complaint that throughout my address there has been generally a maximum of two Senators on the Republican side, because I never complain if I individually am not listened to. Indeed, none of us have a right to complain if we are not listened to. It is not only the right of every Senator to leave the Chamber, but to refuse to listen to the remarks of another Senator, and sometimes it must be done in self-defense. No personal pride enters into what I am saying.

I want a disarmament treaty made which will reduce to the minimum the armaments of all the nations of the world. I want that treaty so made that the United States will be safe and not placed at a disadvantage, and I am imploring the Senators who now pay me the compliment of their attention, and those who have been called away by other business, to study these figures, which I believe in every singular particular to be accurate, for I have taken pains to have them checked by two experts, who know their business if any two men in the United States know the business of comparing naval armaments and the speed and quality of ships.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the Senator made a comparison between the figures which he has given as to tonnage, armament, equipment, and so on, with the figures given at the open conference by the Secretary of State?

Mr. REED. The figures I have given are the same figures which are printed in the hearings; that is to say, when a ship is listed in the hearings as having a particular tonnage I have employed the figures given there. The difference is, as I have explained at length, when perhaps the Senator happened to be out, the English ships are listed under the English measure and the American ships under the American measure, and there is an actual disparity between the two methods of measurement in the British of one-eighth, or 12½ per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I heard the Senator make that explanation, and I have been trying to find in the hearings a statement made by Secretary Hughes to the effect that that difference between the British and the American plans had in some way been reconciled.

Mr. REED. The only thing I found of that character is the statement that as to new vessels, vessels to be hereafter built, they are to be measured according to a rule which is there laid down, and that, of course, would give a uniform rule as to new construction; but that does not apply to vessels now in existence.

Mr. President, not because it has to do with the matter I have just discussed, but because I am called out of town for a day or two, I suggest to Members of the Senate, merely to think about, a question which I think is of importance. We have provided as follows in a recent act of Congress, the merchant marine act of 1920:

That from and after February 1, 1922, the coastwise laws of the United States shall extend to the island territories and possessions of the United States not now covered thereby.

And * * * that the foregoing provisions of this section shall not take effect with reference to the Philippine Islands until the President of the United States after a full investigation of the local needs and conditions shall, by proclamation, declare that an adequate shipping service has been established as herein provided and fix a date for the going into effect of the same.

In a word, the proposition is, upon the proclamation of the President, to extend our coastwise laws so that they will cover trade with the Philippine Islands.

The question I want to put to Senators for their consideration is, whether that will not raise a question justiciable by the four powers; whether the inevitable result would not be that Japan and Great Britain would insist that we had no right to extend to the Philippines our coastwise service and the protection of our coastwise laws, which would, of course, exclude foreign vessels from that trade?

Japan has already, not officially, but through the representative of one of her large steamship lines, raised the question and made a protest. At the same time, Japan has extended her coastwise regulations so as to include Formosa.

I am not prepared, because I have not been able to give study to the question, to state a conclusion, but two things occur to me as within the possibilities, and I suggest them without asserting them: First, that if we undertake to control the trade between the Philippines and the United States under our coastwise laws there will be a sharp protest on the part of Great Britain and Japan, and probably of France, and they will insist upon that as a question of dispute coming within article 1 of this treaty, and will insist on sitting down about the council table to determine it. When they do, every one of them will have an interest against the claim of the United States, and we can look for a three to one vote against us.

The second proposition I make is that it is well worthy of study, since Japan has already extended her coastwise regulations to Formosa, whether she may not assert a similar claim with reference to all of the islands she receives through these various treaties. I repeat, I merely suggest the question for thought, but I believe these two questions are worthy the most serious attention of the Members of the Senate.

My attention was called to this matter a few minutes before I took the floor, and called to my attention, as such things usually are, by a gentleman who could not have his name used because he is connected with the Government service. As soon as a man gets into the Government service he becomes tongue-tied. I do not blame this gentleman, who is a splendid man. If I were to tell his name, it would be recognized that he is a man for whom Senators have the highest regard, as I have. Such men are tongue-tied by virtue of their positions; but, as I said, my attention was called to it by this gentleman, who is so situated that he naturally might anticipate danger from such a proposition as is here involved.

I appeal to the Senate to give that consideration. It may be necessary, even if these treaties are ratified, that some reservation which will clearly protect American rights shall be put in.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do our coastwise laws at present extend to the islands of the Hawaiian group?

Mr. REED. I think so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is my impression. But they do not extend to the Philippines.

Mr. REED. They have not been extended to the Philippines, but I think they extend to the Hawaiian Islands; I am very sure they do.

Mr. President, there is much else I might say along the line I was previously following. I have a few concluding words which I present for the consideration of the Senate as to the naval strategy and the advantages we are giving other nations. The observations I am about to make are not mine. They were prepared for me in this form by a man who undoubtedly ranks high as a naval authority:

The general conduct of a war depends on many things. The elementary test of one navy's power as compared with another's depends on the strength which can be brought to and kept in the main theater of action. It is not what is back in the navy yards or in some distant bases, but what strength can be steadily maintained in the neighborhood where the fighting is to take place that is going to count.

The matter of equality of strength is directly connected with the capability of a navy to bring that strength to bear in the proper locality. The British have fleet bases all over the world, completely fitted with coal, oil, reserve supplies of ammunition, and dry docks. To count only the main ones outside of the home islands, they have Gibraltar, Malta, Suez Canal district, Colombo, Singapore, and Hongkong. Outside of the limits of the United States we have nothing to compare with any of these except for the docks at Panama.

The Japanese main bases are all in her home islands. But there is this great difference between her position and ours: If there is to be any war with Japan, it is understood all over the world that the nation fighting her must carry the conflict to her home waters. Her bases are just where she needs them. We have no base west of Honolulu equipped as a major fleet source of supply or repair.

The four-power treaty was so drawn as to make sure that we shall never be able to construct one and by that restriction, regardless of the size of Navy we may have, we are rendered helpless in the Pacific. If our Navy were ten times as large as it is, the fact that there will be no bases to receive it when it arrives in the vicinity of operations, no reserve supplies of food, fuel, and ammunition and no docks to receive wounded vessels or keep the fleet's bottoms clean, will prevent the operation of that force at any such distance from our bases as the Asiatic mainland.

Remember what happened to the Russian fleet in 1904. When it arrived at the end of its long voyage from the Baltic, the crews were worn out and exhausted by the extended passage; the machinery was crippled and the bottoms fouled by months at sea. The Japanese waited in their home waters for the coming of the Russian fleet. They trained their crews in perfect security. Their ships were clean and ready. The men were rested and confident. The complete obliteration of the slow, exhausted Russian fleet was effected in one day.

The point to be made here is that the Russians had to fight when they arrived. There were no bases to which they might go to rest and refit and clean their ships. The Japanese fought when they pleased and they had plenty of time in which to get ready to do it.

Furthermore, on the subject of fleet bases, it should be noticed that the longitude chosen to designate the western limit of the area in which no further fortifications are to be made was carefully chosen to exclude Singapore. And it is here that the British have repeatedly indicated their intention of establishing their main fleet base for the East and on which the New Zealand, Australian, and East Indian Squadrons are to be concentrated on a declaration of war, there to await the arrival of the main British fleet.

Hongkong comes within the area in which no expansion of the facilities and fortifications of bases is to be allowed. But Hongkong does not need any more. It is impregnably fortified already. It has been the main British base in the East for 60 years and neither trouble nor expense have been spared to make it perfectly secure.

On the other hand, public utterances and public articles have informed the people of this country that Manila and Guam can be captured with ease. The same articles have informed them that these American harbors (and the only ones fit to serve as a fleet base in the East) may be securely defended at a relatively small expense; that without them we shall be helpless in a war in that part of the world; that the four-power treaty will insure that helplessness.

With the restriction of our Navy and the provisions against preparing any fleet bases in the western Pacific, Japan will have gained an absolutely free hand in the Far East. If at any time we are not in accord with her policies, it will make no difference. We will be completely unable to interfere. In agreeing not to fortify the western bases, we have, to all practical purposes, abandoned that part of the world, and we are helpless to shape any action in it. In a word, the Japanese will have gained more from the results of the Limitation of Arms Conference than she could have hoped to secure by a successful war.

Great Britain, on the other hand, will be immediately relieved of the necessity of paralleling our new Navy, partially built. The flat saving to her will be about $800,000,000, or the approximate cost of her fleet. She could, therefore, afford to pay almost any price for the success of the disarmament agreement. And the day it is signed she will sink six of the newest, biggest, and most formidable battle cruisers in the world and seven battleships of the same characteristics without firing a shot. In other words, her bag will be thirteen times as big as it was the day she met the Germans at Jutland.

She is further relieved of the extreme embarrassment which attended the expiration of the Anglo-Japanese treaty. It is a well-known fact that the conference of premiers of the British Dominions last summer refused to sanction the renewal of this treaty; that the opposition to the renewing of this pact was so severe that the British Home Government was unable to announce its policy in regard to the Anglo-Japanese treaty. This situation will be entirely and pleasantly cleared up by the four-power treaty.

Mr. President, all that I have laid before the Senate may be disregarded. We may close our eyes and go blindly forward to confirm these treaties, trusting in some way or other to the god of fortune to look after us, for it is perfectly plain that we can not trust to those who represented us when they tell us that the strategic value of the islands of the Pacific was not even considered.

A possible scene rises before me. I can see this Nation unhappily involved in war with Great Britain. I can see our fleet moving out, and as it goes every man upon the decks understands that in case the British Navy is met and overcomes the American Navy there will be no colors struck, there will be no surrender, but that as a vessel sinks, even as its decks are awash, the guns will still thunder their defiance and the last man will go to a watery death. That is the tradition of our Navy. It is also the tradition of the British Navy.

As the fleet sails out the men walking its decks will know, the men on shore will know, the women will know at that time if they do not know now that in tonnage the British have one-eighth more than we in battleships, that in guns they are vastly superior, that they can hurl broadsides far outweighing ours, and that their guns for the most part outweigh ours. They will know that we have not a single battle cruiser. They will know that Great Britain's battle fleet can sail away from us and that her cruisers can run around our fleet and utterly defy it. They will know that our slow-going fleet can not bring the British to a fight unless the British are willing to fight and to make the circumstances satisfactory to themselves when they enter the fight; to pick their day, their time, and their place, and they, of course, as sensible men, will pick the right day for them and the right time and place for them.

They will know, with cold hearts they will know, that we have sent our men out to a desperate venture, where they do not have a fair and equal chance. If you do not think of these disparities to-day, if you live until the event comes of which I am speaking you will think of them then, you will think of them with souls that will be horrified at your present carelessness, and you will think of them with the curses of fathers and mothers burning in your ears because you did not think and act when it was your duty to act.

You say we will never have a war with Great Britain. God knows I hope we will never have a war with any country; and yet as long as nations build great battle fleets, as long as they insist in bargaining that they shall have the advantage of the weapons, we know that war may come; and he who does not look ahead and anticipate not certain dangers but possible dangers is unworthy the name of statesman and is a disgrace to the Government he pretends to serve.

I do not know what the result of this treaty fight will be, but I do know that there is to be a propaganda in the country, organized, systematized, and capitalized. I know that it has money to send out its agents, for I see the tracks of the agents. I know that it has the money to send out circulars and letters and telegrams by the thousands, for we see the evidence of them. Who is it that carries on this propaganda? What interest is back of it? Why is it done? Why this haste to drive these treaties through? Why the threat of night and day sessions until there was forced an agreement to vote? Why should not these measures have been submitted to the American people? The very men who now cry, "Haste, haste; drive on; drive on; make haste," a few months ago were standing across this aisle insisting that another great treaty involved the interests of America, and that it should be submitted to the grand assize of the people. The very men who now insist on driving through to a quick conclusion were the men who then insisted that the people had a right to know, to be advised, to understand. The very influences that are now propagandizing this country were then insisting upon submitting the question to a great referendum of the people. We had the grand assize; we took the vote. The present occupant of the White House had given the people of the United States to understand there never would be a treaty made while he was President that would involve the United States in any kind of a binding obligation, in any kind of an alliance. Upon the faith of his word he secured a majority of nearly 7,000,000 votes in the United States. I shall on another occasion put his language into the RECORD, and I hesitate not to charge that he has broken faith with the American people; that he has broken faith with millions of men who voted for him.

I hesitate not to charge that those upon the other side of the Chamber who stood with him a few short months ago have turned their coats, have altered their opinions because, forsooth, they now have a treaty presented to them by a man of their party; yet I can hear their words echoing in my ears when they proclaimed a few short months ago that they stood above all party alignments, that no party prejudice controlled their action, and that they were voting as Americans and lovers of their country. They repudiated reservations then; they insisted upon the doctrine of Washington then; they stood squarely fronting the issue; but now they crawl under the miserable veil of a miserable reservation. They have "gone to heel" as well-trained setters "go to heel" at the master's command.

And the master—from whom is he taking his commands? From Root? The man whose close connection with great and sinister interests was commented upon by a very distinguished gentleman at the time. From Root, who was in favor of the compact that was brought here from Versailles, and ready to swallow it in its entirety; who talked of reservations only because he hoped to allay the rising storm and to save the body of the instrument from defeat.

The President selected another as his chief adviser, the present Secretary of State, who was also in favor of entangling alliances, but who wanted to put in some reservations which every lawyer who has read the documents knows took out of it not one single essential quality. He was selected and placed at the head of the State Department.

The President chose another of those who stood ready to do that which he had throughout his long campaign denounced as a betrayal of his country, and elevated Mr. Taft to the highest judicial position in the world.

He went further. He found a gentleman who had lived all his life in Great Britain after he was 21 years of age; who has never yet voted in the United States; whose house and home were in England; who came to this country, and when he was asked his politics, said he was "a liberal," not knowing at that time enough about American politics to know our party names. Some months later, not knowing enough about our party politics successfully to classify himself either as a Republican or a Democrat, not himself knowing and nobody else knowing, accordingly a number of Democratic papers started running him for the Democratic nomination for President and a number of Republican papers started running him for the Republican nomination. He was also looked on with great favor by the Socialists and people of that kind. That man, Herbert Hoover, who was also in favor of world entanglements, was put into the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

Another member of his Cabinet has been quoted repeatedly as so favorable to foreign interests that he has advocated the cancellation of the American foreign debt, and I have never heard his denial of that statement.

The President calls a conference for the purpose of agreeing upon the reduction of armament, a thing dear to the hearts of all the people of this country and dear to the hearts of all the people of the world. Having called it for that purpose there comes out of it this alliance, which we are now told does nothing, and yet there is not a man who makes that statement, in my opinion, who makes it in good faith. I do not believe it possible for an intelligent man to make that sort of statement and believe it.

We are told that the conference has produced an agreement for naval equality. I have exposed the iniquity and subterfuge of that proposition.

As I stand and look at these empty benches I wonder where now are the gallant 18, the "irreconcilibles," the men who said they would never put this country into an alliance with other countries; that they would never subject it to the decision of foreign powers; that they would stand by the doctrine of George Washington, which they declared to be immortal and indestructible. They have turned. They join not in the debate; they sit with silent lips. They apparently are ashamed of their own attitude, and take refuge in two statements: First, that this is a great treaty which will preserve the peace of the Pacific and prevent all onslaught in that direction by any power on earth; that it is a treaty of great power and great potentiality. They point to it and say, "there it stands, the Gibraltar of our hope, the protection of the peace of the waters of the Pacific, indeed of the waters of the world." Then, in the next statement they say, "the agreement amounts to nothing; it binds nobody to do anything; it is so weak and poor a thing that we can sign it because it is innocuous and can do neither harm nor good." That is the picture these gentlemen paint of themselves; and so they stand before the American people, one hand holding a treaty which they declare is powerful, potential, compelling, and the other hand holding a repudiation of all they have said. But it is now said the Republican Party has to do something; it has not done anything as yet, and so it had better do something, even if the something amounts to nothing.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, while I was absent yesterday afternoon in attendance upon the Committee on the Judiciary, which was considering the resolution inquiring into the eligibility of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and Representative BURTON to membership on the World War Foreign Debt Commission, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] delivered a speech, from which I quote a brief extract. I read from page 3908 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> The Americans who fought the War of Independence were Scotch and English and Welsh and Scotch-Irish. This crowd, now howling and pleading the baby act, had nothing to do with it.

A reading of the Senator's previous remarks indicates the Senator from Mississippi, in that elegant vernacular which he sometimes employs in the Senate, in referring to this "crowd" meant the large body of citizens of Irish extraction. I insist that, at least in the Senate of the United States, a man who pretends to be an historian, who has a reputation throughout the United States as an historian, ought not be permitted, unrebuked and unchallenged, to fall into such an egregious blunder as to say that the citizens of Irish extraction had nothing to do with aiding the patriot cause in the Revolutionary War.

Mr. President, in the latter part of the year 1778 and in the early part of the year 1779, during our American Revolution, there was dissatisfaction in England, and especially in Parliament, with reference to some of the movements of the English generals.

Severe strictures were made in Parliament against Sir William Howe, commander of the English forces on the American Continent, and a parliamentary investigation was had as to the evolutions and movements of the English troops in America.

Hon. Joseph Galloway, who had been for some 12 years speaker of the house of delegates or the house of assembly of the Pennsylvania Legislature, was called upon to testify before a joint committee of the two houses of Parliament. His testimony was published in the Royal Gazette, then printed by James Rivington, printer to the King, and in the issue of the Royal Gazette of Wednesday, October 27, 1779, the original of which is in the Congressional Library, and photographic copy of which I have here, the following testimony was given by Mr. Galloway:

> Q. That part of the rebel army that enlisted in the service of the Congress, were they chiefly composed of natives of America or were the greatest part of them English, Scotch, and Irish?

Mr. Galloway answered:

> A. The names and places of their nativity being taken down, I can answer the question with precision. There was scarcely one-fourth natives of America; about one-half Irish; the other fourth were English and Scotch.

The Senator from Mississippi is an historian, and he surely must know that in the fields of war the Irish race has furnished more luminaries than have been furnished by any other race in Europe. In our own Revolution we recall Gen. Greene; Gen. Richard Montgomery, who fell at Quebec and who was so highly esteemed as a soldier by that other great soldier, Aaron Burr, that when Montgomery fell at the head of his men, Burr rushed forward alone and, under fire of the English guns, carried back the precious body of Gen. Richard Montgomery; Gen. George Clinton, brigadier general, governor of New York and twice Vice President, was an Irishman; Andrew Jackson, whom as a soldier and statesman neither man nor muse can praise too much, was born of Irish parents who came from Carrickfergus.

We perceive that the Duke of Wellington, the Iron Duke, was an Irishman. So were Lord Kitchener and Lord Roberts and Gen. French.

Gen. James Shields, Senator from three States, was an Irishman.

In our war between the States we remember Generals Phil Kearney, McDowell, McCall, Thomas, Meagher, and gallant Pat Cleburn, all of Irish origin; and who does not recall the great triumvirate, Sherman, Sheridan, and Grant, all of Irish parentage? While on this subject let me remark that no more splendid figure arose out of the Civil War than the Irishman, Stonewall Jackson.

Charles Thomson, patriot, was born in Maghera, County Derry, Ireland, November 29, 1729. He was brought to this country in 1740, attended the academy of Francis Allison, and while very young was made principal of a Friends academy at Newcastle, Pa. He was respected and trusted by the colonists, and was a prominent local leader during the strained relations with the mother country. He was the secretary in every Continental Congress, 1774–1789, and from the private memoranda that he made compiled a history of the Revolution.

It will be remembered that Judge James Wilson, the grandfather of President Wilson, was born in County Down, Ireland; that the ancestors of President James K. Polk came from Donegal, Ireland; that the ancestors of President James Buchanan and President McKinley came from the same vicinity; that the ancestors of President Arthur came from Antrim, Ireland; and that the mother of President Roosevelt was Irish.

Agricola, who was born A. D. 37 and lived until about A. D. 93, advised the empire builders of his day that—

> Rome should war down and take possession of Ireland so that freedom might be put out of sight.

Thus, in this early Roman reference to Ireland we pick up for the first time the golden thread of Irish militant resistance to imperial exploitation, and this thread of courage and patriotism runs through all Irish history.

On the one side is the "warring down" so that freedom might be put out of sight, and on the other it is the eternal struggle to uphold the rights of free men.

Contemplating the Europe that existed before the Christian era, in the east we find Greece; in the west we find Ireland, and it is Ireland alone amongst the lands of western Europe that preserves the recorded traditions of its speech, culture, and song that connect the half of Europe with its ancestral past.

It was the Irish race that lit the lamp of genius in the brain of Europe.

When the unlettered Welsh and English ancestors of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself were staring in mute amazement at the Phœnician and Carthaginian navigators who, before the Christian era, visited the Scilly Islands, then called the "Islands of Tin," to obtain a supply of that metal, the Irish race was fully acquainted with the use of precious metals, the fabrication of fine linens, was fond of music and song, and was enjoying its literature.

When the Druids at Stonehenge, on Salisbury Plain, made their last midnight sacrifice, the triennial council of the Irish people was held at the great hall or court of Tara, where Irish kings and nobles assembled.

King Alfred the Great ascended the English throne in the year 871 A. D., and he was indeed one of the world's wisest and noblest men. He ruled for 30 years, and he proved himself to be a valiant warrior and an earnest patron of whatever promised to promote the good of his people, but long before Alfred ascended the English throne the Irish race had scattered throughout Europe manuscripts of priceless masterpieces limned by Irish scribes, such as the Book of Kells in the library of Trinity College at Dublin, acknowledged to be the most beautiful book in the world; indeed, into its pages are woven such a wealth of ornament and it has such an ecstasy of art that the colors are as lustrous, as fresh, and as soft as though it was the work of yesterday, but the book was made 1,200 years ago.

In the fields of oratory and poetry history swarms with the names of Irish orators and poets whose lips were touched by the Promethean fire.

Shakespeare tells us how imperial governments looked upon Ireland in his day. Historians will recall that Richard II landed in Ireland the first time in 1394, and Shakespeare, who erected a mighty dome which fills and glorifies the intellectual sky, made Richard II say this of Ireland:

> We will ourself in person to this war.
> And, for our coffers, with too great a court,
> And liberal largesse, are grown somewhat light,
> We are enforced to farm our royal realm;
> The revenue whereof shall furnish us
> For our affairs in hand; if that come short,
> Our substitutes at home shall have blank charters;
> Whereto, when they shall know what men are rich,
> They shall subscribe them for large sums of gold,
> And send them after, to supply our wants;
> For we will make for Ireland presently.

Again, speaking of his uncle, John of Gaunt, brother of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, Shakespeare said:

> Now put it, Heaven, in his physician's mind
> To help him to his grave immediately!
> The lining of his coffers shall make coats
> To deck our soldiers for these Irish wars.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I am interested in his remarks, and he reminds me of the fact that my ancestors, the Northmen, sometimes called the Norse pirates, occupied Ireland for a hundred years. They had Norwegian kings in the city of Dublin, and I have an idea that they left some of their warlike and piratical spirit among the Irish.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no doubt they did; the Senator from Minnesota frequently leaves with us no piratical spirit, indeed, because he is too honorable to be a pirate, but he frequently leaves his warlike spirit with us, and when the seats here, which have known him for so many years, no longer know him, which I hope will be many years yet, he will be remembered with affectionate regard by his fellows who served with him here, because never in all his long service in public life has he seen fit to insult any of the races making up the United States, or any of our fellow citizens.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I am sure it must be in the mind of the Senator, though he has not mentioned it, that the Irish planted religion and education in Europe. The great Emperor Charlemagne imported school-teachers from Ireland, and the great missionary Columbianus and others carried the Christian religion into western Europe. The greatest lawyers, the greatest orators, and some of the greatest poets, as well as the greatest warriors who ever lived, were Irish.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for his reinforcement of my argument. I confess I would have overlooked it if I knew it. I do not know that I was aware of the fact, but since the Senator has refreshed my mind I will be glad to rest the case there, because I prefer to trust to the accuracy of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] rather than to the accuracy of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on this Irish question, because I think the Senator from Georgia has no bias and no prejudice against any race, and for that he is to be congratulated.

As in legislative session,

LEGISLATIVE SUGGESTIONS.

Mr. McNARY. I have received a very interesting letter from a citizen of the State of Oregon, open in its character, and he desires me to request that it be read in the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that it may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

An open letter to all Members of the United States Congress, Senators and Representatives, Washington, D. C.

PORTLAND, OREG., March 5, 1922.

GENTLEMEN: In order that you may get an intelligent idea of economic conditions throughout the United States, I suggest that at the close of the present congressional session each of you don the usual dress of a farmer or industrial worker, have but a dollar or two in your pocket, and no check book.

Thus, traveling incog, hike from your present luxurious surroundings to your home wherever that may be. Camp with the wayfarer; visit mines, factories, and farms; take potluck with Uncle Sam's children everywhere. See their daily routine, hear their plaints and prayers, heft their load of handicap and responsibility, estimate their love of home and country, their loyalty, courage, patience, and perseverance, get in touch with the great, throbbing heart of the American people.

Then, when you have arrived at your own home, gather about you the most reliable and complete statistics of our Government and civil actuaries and figure out how these people are to pay the usury—wrongly called interest—on our aggregated indebtedness, which—national, State, county, municipal, school districts, port districts, improvement districts, transportation corporations, industrial corporations, private mortgages, notes, and bank loans—is not less than $200,000,000,000, approximately $2,000 for each man, woman, and child in the United States.

At 6 per cent compounded annually this sum doubles itself in a little less than 12 years. Is it not time we quit the little side shows and gathered in the one big circus of human woes under one canvas?

In another 10 years mortgages will have taken both the Republican elephant and the Democratic ass. On what, gentlemen, will you then ride?

The estimated wealth of the United States is approximately $400,000,000,000. If we persist in our present monetary insanity, we have but to consider the accumulated results of the last 10 years to know what our circumstances will be 10 years hence.

The equilibrium beyond which even big business dare not go now confronts us. What are you going to do with the usury system which has brought us to our present deplorable state of affairs?

Cordially, yours,

C. L. LOCKE.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether this is an argument in favor of the League of Nations, or against the bonus, or in favor of abrogating and repudiating the public debt entirely?

Mr. McNARY. I think it is very largely a reflection of some of the speeches and notions so eloquently expressed by the Senator from Utah.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2897) to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that the House receded from its amendment numbered 4 to the said bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is a full agreement. I ask for the immediate consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a few days ago a desultory debate took place in the Senate regarding Muscle Shoals and the nitrate plant there, particularly with reference to the offer of Mr. Ford. The eloquent and distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] seems to have agreed upon a verdict favorable to Mr. Ford, and evidently wants the Government to accept his offer. At that time I suggested and counseled that all these offers be given serious consideration, and, I think, expressed the opinion that the plant is more or less obsolete and that a change in the process would be necessary.

Having that in mind, I call attention to the fact that on Tuesday, March 14, there appeared an article in the Washington Post regarding the matter, which I ask unanimous consent to have read by the Secretary.

There being no objection, the Assistant Secretary read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Tuesday, Mar. 14, 1922.]

SAYS FORD WOULD LOSE "LAST PENNY" ON PLANT—MUSCLE SHOALS, EXPERT DECLARES, CAN NOT PRODUCE COMMERCIAL FERTILIZERS.

Charles L. Parsons, consulting chemist and former technical adviser to the Government on nitrate fixation, testified yesterday before the House Military Committee that Henry Ford or any other person or company would "lose their last penny" before they ever produced commercial fertilizers at nitrate plant No. 2, at Muscle Shoals, Ala. The plant which has cost the Government about $69,000,000, the witness said, was designed to be operated only by the cyanamid process of nitrate fixation, an obsolete method, and was worthless as a fertilizer producer.

The cyanamid process was condemned by Mr. Parsons as obsolete and economically impossible, having been superseded, he declared, by improved methods. It was his conviction, he added, that the Muscle Shoals plant could not be redesigned to produce commercial fertilizers. This judgment was based, he explained, on a thorough investigation of the cyanamid plants in Europe, many of which were being closed down by bankrupt operators, while others already had gone out of business because they could not compete with establishments using the improvements.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word at this juncture. Replying to the statement in the Washington Post which was read by request of my good friend the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], it is in keeping with the suggestion I made a few days ago to the effect that the present plant at Muscle Shoals does not manufacture a complete fertilizer. Henry Ford will put in the necessary equipment at Muscle Shoals to manufacture fertilizer complete. I can not understand how any man of intelligence would write an article to the effect that fertilizers can not be manufactured at Muscle Shoals. There are a few fertilizer factories in my State now operating on a small scale. If they can manufacture fertilizer complete, why can not a man of Henry Ford's financial strength, skill, and genius put up a plant on a large scale and manufacture commercial fertilizer? There is no doubt on earth but that he will be able to do that. He is going to contract with the Government that he will do it and there is no doubt about his being able to do it. With the equipment already established at Muscle Shoals certain fertilizer ingredients can be manufactured now. Henry Ford has been to Muscle Shoals. He has seen the plants that now turn out certain fertilizer ingredients and he says that he can manufacture and that he will manufacture a complete fertilizer at Muscle Shoals. That is all I care to say just now.

RELIEF OF FARMERS IN CROP-FAILURE AREAS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. LADD. I ask leave to call up the conference report on Senate bill 2897, which I submitted yesterday. I do not think there will be any discussion of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the following conference report, which will be read.

The report was read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2897) to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, and 6, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum $1,000,000 proposed by said amendment insert "$1,500,000"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"An act to appropriate $1,500,000 for the purchase of seed grain to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

And the House agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the amendment of the House numbered 4.

PETER NORBECK,
JOHN B. KENDRICK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. McLAUGHLIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KING. This is a partial report, I understand?

Mr. LADD. No; it is a full report. The House recedes from amendment numbered 4.

Mr. KING. There are two messages from the House then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House receding from amendment numbered 4 to the bill. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WARREN. Let me ask the Senator to what figure the report reduces the amount?

Mr. LADD. From $5,000,000 to $1,500,000. It cuts out the appropriation for feed altogether.

Mr. WARREN. This is for seed?

Mr. LADD. For seed entirely.

The report was agreed to.

BOARD OF ACCOUNTANCY FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2531) to create a board of accountancy for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. It is a local bill reported unanimously from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read.

Mr. HARRISON. Reserving the right to object, I should like to know something about the purposes of the bill.

Mr. CAPPER. It proposes to create a board of accountancy in the District of Columbia. There is no regulation of any kind in so far as accountancy is concerned in the District. The bill is in line with the law in two-thirds of the States of the Union and is recommended by the Government departments in Washington, especially the Internal Revenue Bureau, which is most concerned.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is it not correct that a school has been organized in the District to teach accountancy and is giving certificates, or rather diplomas, to people as certified public accountants without any regulation of the District or otherwise?

Mr. CAPPER. That is true.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The purpose of the bill is to provide a regulatory body to control and put them very much on the basis of similar work in the States where they are now controlled by State laws?

Mr. CAPPER. That is exactly the purpose of the bill. There is a so-called school here now that is issuing or pretending to issue certificates or diplomas which have really no value. The bill is intended to protect the District of Columbia against that sort of business.

Mr. HARRISON. So if the bill becomes a law, anyone who desires to become a public accountant must make application to some commission or board and pass an examination before a certificate is issued and before he can become a public accountant?

Mr. CAPPER. Before he can be a certified public accountant. I suggest that the report of the committee be read. It will explain the matter.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. CAPPER. Oh, yes.

Mr. HARRISON. And it has passed the House?

Mr. CAPPER. No; it is a Senate bill. It has the approval of the District Commissioners; it has the approval of the accountants of this city and of the various departments of the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise for a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the record show that the Senate has returned to legislative session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not.

Mr. LODGE. It is done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Kansas is for unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I merely wish to understand the status.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah ask that the bill be read? He made that request, and the reading was interrupted.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask a question or two in regard to the measure, and probably, if those answers are satisfactory, I shall not ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has submitted the request of the Senator from Kansas for the present consideration of the bill, which has not yet been agreed to by the Senate. That is now pending.

Mr. KING. I do not object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2531) to create a board of accountancy for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Washington or the Senator from Kansas whether they regard a bill of this character as necessary in the District?

Mr. CAPPER. There is a very strong demand for it. The District Commissioners believe that it is necessary. The Government departments here are very much interested in it. The Internal Revenue Bureau, which employs a large number of accountants and which is interested in accountancy as it is carried on in the District, particularly requests a measure of this kind. It is in line with laws that are now in effect all over the country. It simply guarantees careful accountancy and some responsibility by certified public accountants.

Mr. KING. I understand there is a demand throughout the country, and I have had hundreds of letters from all parts of the United States urging that I support the bill. It seemed to me there must have been some propaganda or some persons interested in securing the passage of the measure, or there would not have been this appeal, which is nation-wide in character, in favor of the bill.

It looks as though this is in line with the demand that everybody who intends to prosecute a business shall get a license; that you have to put the stamp of the Government or some Government functionary upon everybody; that you must get a license before you can engage in any business.

Of course, I appreciate the fact that it is difficult to draw the line. Lawyers have to pass an examination. Even barbers now have to pass an examination. Practically everybody who practices any sort of a profession is compelled to pass an examination and get a license. After a while no one can be a farmer or a bricklayer or even a worker upon the streets unless he passes an examination and gets a license. You will have to have a Government stamp upon your back before you can do anything.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will permit me, I think this is very much in line with the profession of law or of medicine and matters like that, because the certified public accountants do a special kind of business and that business requires special qualifications if it is to be done properly. I understand, although I may be mistaken, that there are only about 2,500 or 3,000 certified public accountants in the United States. To be a certified public accountant a man is supposed not only to have experience, but special training as well.

As I understand the situation here in the District, a school has been organized and issues what purports to be, and I suppose are, in the absence of regulations, certificates under which a person may claim to have a certificate as a duly certified public accountant. They may have practically no qualifications such as are generally required by public accountants in the States.

It is the purpose of the bill to see that the men who hold certificates as certified public accountants are duly qualified, just like I think everybody would concede that a man who is admitted to the bar should be admitted under such circumstances and regulations as will be a reasonable guaranty to the public that he has had the necessary training and has gone through the necessary studies. That is, the purpose of the bill with reference to certified public accountants in the District of Columbia is to see to it that the man who holds himself out as a certified public accountant has had the training that is generally required of those who hold certificates of that character. As I understand it there are now no such regulations in the District.

Mr. KING. May I say that a number of individuals have written me protesting against the bill. They say it is an attempt upon the part of a certain select few to monopolize the accountancy business of the United States; that the few want to get control of the bookkeeping or the accounting business in the various States, and then in the United States, and that they want to keep out of the work of accountancy those who do not take examinations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The purpose of the committee, I am satisfied, is to protect the public, as far as it can be done by reasonable regulations, from men who are not fitted to do work they claim they are able to do, and which is work that requires special training and special qualifications.

Mr. KING. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in many lines of activity men representing themselves to be competent are employed, and the employer soon discovers their incompetency, if they prove to be incompetent, and discharges them and seeks somebody else to perform the task.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, that is true; but I do not think the Senator would contend for a moment that anybody who wants to practice law should be permitted to do it without any preparation or special qualification. I think that the work of a certified public accountant, so far as I know it, although I am not an accountant, is work which requires special training and special study in order that a man may be fitted to do it. If I had anything of the kind to be done, I would want to know that the man I was employing had had reasonably proper training.

It is a question of the interest of the public. It may, of course, result in keeping some people out of that business who would like to go into it without any special preparation. Possibly a good many people might like to go into law without being required to go through a certain course of study, and all that sort of thing, but in the interest of the public regulations are made and boards are provided, so that the man who holds a certificate along certain lines may be assumed at least to be reasonably well qualified to do the work.

Mr. KING. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a complaint which was made by a merchant in a communication to me. He stated that in order to get credit he had to furnish from a certified accountant the condition of his business, his liabilities, assets, and so forth, and that the certified accountants seemed to be banded together; that they charged him $50 a day to make the examination; and that it took weeks, whereas a competent bookkeeper, one who had kept his books and who knew the business, could have furnished such a statement within a day or two, or two or three days, at the outside; but he was not permitted to employ him or one of that character; that his own bookkeeper knew far more about accountancy than did the certified accountant; and that he was compelled to pay hundreds of dollars in order to furnish that statement.

There is complaint that legislation of this kind is in the interest of a select few; that it is to build up an organization composed of the elite and to let them monopolize the business. Of course, they convey the idea that no one else is competent to submit a report or to examine books except members of their particular organization. I am not criticizing the public accountants, for I know many of them, and they are very able men.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest that in the case cited by the Senator the public accountant probably was not responsible for the request that he be employed, but that the man to whom application was made for a loan insisted before he would make the loan, or whatever the transaction was, that a report should be made to him by persons in whom he had confidence. That is a very natural attitude. While the merchant to whom the Senator from Utah referred may have been satisfied that his bookkeeper could have made a satisfactory report—and he might have been able to do so; I do not know—nevertheless, as I have indicated, the man who was furnishing the accommodation would not be satisfied with such a report. I can very naturally see how that would be true. If I had a large amount of money to invest in a very complicated business, at any rate, or in making a loan, I should want a report from a man who I was confident knew what he was doing when he was preparing his report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this legislation, of course, is in line with the legislation which is being enacted in the States and in municipalities and in Congress. It presupposes the incapacity of the people to look after their own business. We have to have boards and commissions and organizations and Federal and State and municipal supernumeraries to put their hands upon the people. After awhile we shall have more boards and commissions and officials than we shall have persons who work; we shall have just two classes—those who toil and the great class of officeholders, and the latter will outnumber the toilers. Instead of each toiler carrying a soldier on his back he will carry an officeholder or some member of a commission. I suppose, however, we can not stem the tide of this legislation, for it seems to be quite agreeable to the sentiment of the people.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have much sympathy with the latter suggestions of the Senator from Utah, I will say.

Mr. SHEPPARD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Senate resumed legislative session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the request to consider the bill was granted. The Chair considered the bill, of course a legislative proposition, and assumed that the Senate had resumed its legislative session only to the extent of the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I did not understand that the request was to have the bill considered as in legislative session. I simply wanted to have the RECORD show that it was being so considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understood. The amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia will be stated.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, in section 4, page 3, line 12, after the word "or" to insert the word "one"; in line 15 to strike out the letter "c" and to insert the letter "b"; in the same line to strike out the letter "d" and insert the letter "c"; in line 17 to strike out the letter "e" and insert the letter "d"; in line 20 to insert a comma after the word "accountant"; in line 22 to strike out the letter "f" and insert the letter "e"; on page 4, line 4, to strike out the letter "e" and to insert the letter "d"; in line 11 to strike out the letter "e" and insert

"d"; and in line 14 to strike out the words "provided such person also holds the diploma required in said clause (e)," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the board of accountancy shall not grant a certificate as a certified public accountant to any person other than (a) a citizen of the United States, or one who has duly declared his or her intention of becoming such citizen, who is over the age of 21 years, and (b) of good moral character, (c) who is a graduate of a high school with a four years' course or has had an equivalent education, and (d) who has received a diploma from some recognized school of accountancy and has had one year's experience in the employment of a practicing certified public accountant, or has had three years' experience in the employ of a practicing certified public accountant, and (e) except under the provisions of section 6 of this act, who shall have successfully passed examinations in the theory and practice of general accounting, in commercial law as affecting accountancy, and in such other related subjects as the board may deem advisable: Provided, That the board of accountancy may waive the provision for accounting experience as set forth in clause (d) above, and in lieu thereof may hold in abeyance a certificate to any person who shall otherwise have qualified until such time as the applicant can prove to have served two years in the employ of a practicing certified public accountant: Provided further, That the board may waive the requirement for service in the employ of a practicing certified public accountant, as set forth in clause (d) above, in the case of any person who has had not less than five years' actual and continuous experience in auditing the books and accounts of other persons in three or more distinct lines of commercial business, but nothing contained in this act shall be construed as granting any power to waive any provision of this act other than as set forth herein, nor shall any such waiver be granted except by the unanimous vote of the members of the board.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether this bill imposes any charge upon the District of Columbia and whether it imposes any limitation upon the compensation which the board of accountancy may charge for their services?

Mr. CAPPER. It provides for a charge of $25 for an examination, which will take care of the cost of conducting the examination and the expenses of the board.

Mr. KING. The board, then, may absorb the entire amount they receive from the applicants for licenses?

Mr. CAPPER. The board is appointed by the commissioners, and are officers subject to their direction the same as is any other board in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. The point I am trying to get at is that there is no charge upon the District?

Mr. CAPPER. Not at all.

Mr. KING. Is this board permitted to absorb all of the income which is derived from the applicants?

Mr. CAPPER. No; they must turn in the fees to the District of Columbia?

Mr. KING. What will they receive for their services? If there were 1,000 applicants in a year, the collections would amount to $25,000. Would the board absorb it all? Is there any limitation?

Mr. CAPPER. The provision of the bill governing that matter reads as follows:

From the fees collected under this act the board shall pay all expenses incident to the examinations, the expenses of issuing certificates, and traveling expenses of the members of the board while performing their duties under this act; and if any surplus remain on the 30th day of June of each year the members of the board shall be paid therefrom such reasonable compensation as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may determine: Provided, That no expenses incurred under this act shall be a charge against the funds of the United States nor the District of Columbia. The board shall annually report the number of certificates issued and the receipts and expenses under this act during each fiscal year to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. Then, they have to wait until the end of the year to find out how much has been received, and the commissioners then determine what compensation shall be paid each member of the board?

Mr. CAPPER. They make return of the fees received to the District Commissioners.

Mr. KING. The Senator read something about traveling expenses. What traveling expenses will they have?

Mr. CAPPER. Traveling expenses in the District of Columbia, of course, can not be very much of an item.

Mr. KING. It is not intended that they shall go outside of the District to make examinations?

Mr. CAPPER. Not at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GULF, FLORIDA & ALABAMA RAILWAY CO.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2599) for the relief of the receiver of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co. The bill was introduced over a year ago, and was referred to the Committee on Claims. It has the unanimous report of that committee, and the recommendation of the department. It has also passed the scrutiny of the Budget authorities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida for the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I ask that the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $27,008.04, for the relief of the receiver of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co. as full compensation for amounts expended and unreclaimable in connection with the construction of an extension of tracks to the United States naval air station and yard at Pensacola, Fla.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if appropriations have not been made for the Navy Department to meet that charge, if it is a charge against the Navy Department?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the Navy Department have no funds out of which to pay it. The Secretary of the Navy recommends the passage of this bill; the Navy Department have examined it and admit they ordered the railroad track built to the air station and the expense to be incurred by the railroad company. They have checked up the amount and find it accurate and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would the Senator object to having an amendment added to the bill providing that the amount appropriated shall be a charge against the Navy Department? The point I have in mind is this: We frequently make appropriations for Army expenses or for Navy expenses which are not charged either to the Army or to the Navy, and when we seek to ascertain the expenses of the Army or the Navy many items which are chargeable against those services are charged to some other fund, and the result is we do not always know what the Army and the Navy cost.

Mr. FLETCHER. The transaction involved in this bill was incident to the operations carried on during the war. The track was built for the naval air station during the war, and the expense was incurred at the instance of the Navy Department. There is no question about that. I repeat the Secretary of the Navy has recommended this course. I do not know how we could amend the bill so as to provide that the amount appropriated shall be charged to the Navy. The bill speaks for itself in that connection. As I have said, it grows out of the naval operation at the naval air station at Pensacola.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator why it has not been included in some naval bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know that it belongs on the naval appropriation bill. It should properly, I think, come in the form of a separate bill. The Navy Department has no funds to take care of it otherwise.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, is this one of the expenditures made by the Director General of Railroads under the Federal control act?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the director general ordered it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If this is one of the expenditures made by the director general as an addition to or a betterment of a railroad of which he was in possession, then the railroad became bound, under the terms of that act, to repay the Government of the United States the amount so expended. I do not know just how the expenditure was made, or when it was made; but if it is one of the expenditures made by the director general for additions or betterments to a railroad the Government is under no obligation whatever to pay that money.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is only what has remained after salvaging everything in connection with it. This expenditure was incurred at the instance of the Navy Department and is the balance due this company. The Secretary of the Navy reports:

Further replying to the committee's letter of October 24 last, you are informed that careful consideration has been given to Senate bill 2599, "For the relief of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co."

In May, 1918, it was deemed advisable to obtain the extension of the tracks of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co. to the naval air station at Pensacola, Fla., and an arrangement was made with the receiver of the road having that end in view.

The right of way was acquired by the receiver and the grading done and the material necessary purchased, but the road had not been finished at the signing of the armistice, with the consequent discontinuance of its construction.

Such portions of the material as were available were used by the receiver on other parts of the railway under his control, but there remained expenditures for right of way, grading, bridges, etc., which could not be salvaged. These amounted to $27,008.04—

The amount in this bill.

While it is probable that the receiver at the inception of this work anticipated that he would be reimbursed through the traffic to be obtained, it is also true that the early discontinuance of the work, before the receipt of any traffic earnings, was not anticipated. I am therefore of the opinion that this legislation should pass, and recommend favorable action by the Congress.

A clear comprehension of the entire question may be obtained from the statement of claim filed by the receiver, of which a copy is herewith transmitted for your information.

This proposed legislation has been submitted to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, as required by paragraph 3 (b) of Circular No. 49 of that bureau, and the director advises that this request for legislation is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Sincerely, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CUMMINS. I take it from the statement just read that the Senator is in error with regard to the conditions under which the additions or betterments were made. They were not made by the director general.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; and they were not really completed when the armistice was signed.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Federal control act did not end with the armistice.

Mr. FLETCHER. No. They were made by the receiver at the instance of the Navy Department.

Mr. CUMMINS. With that understanding I make no objection to the bill; but if the director general made the improvements or ordered the betterments, then under the terms of the act which control him there would be no liability on the part of the United States. On the contrary, the railroad company itself, if the director general expended the money, would be under obligation to return the money so expended.

Mr. FLETCHER. I misunderstood the Senator. That was not the situation here. The claim is a very just one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether this provision, which I find in the report, would change the conclusion which he now apparently has reached? I see an agreement here signed by the syndicate managers of the reorganization of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co., and so forth, as follows:

Agreement made this ——— day of June, 1918, between John T. Steele and W. F. Fuqua & Co., as syndicate managers under the plan and agreement for reorganization of the Gulf, Florida, & Alabama Railway Co., dated November 2, 1917, party of the first part, hereinafter known as the "syndicate managers," and the Capital Issues Committee, party of the second part, hereinafter known as the "committee."

Then the agreement proceeds to set forth certain conditions under which, I suppose, issues might be made. Is there anything there which would indicate——

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the War Finance Corporation furnished some of the money which the director general expended, but under the law the director general went forward and spent or agreed to spend whatever money was necessary to put properties in the proper condition to operate and to make such extensions as the war service required at that time; but the same agreement provided that the railroad companies should return to the Government the moneys thus expended, and they are doing that now. They must return altogether more than a billion dollars; and I thought, from the first reading of the bill, that this might have been an expenditure made under that act.

Mr. FLETCHER. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. From the reading of the report, however, I take it that it was not made by the director general at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; not at all. The road was released entirely in order that the receivers might make this contract with the Navy Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN HAWAII.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed, as in legislative session, to the consideration of House bill 7881, Order of Business 495.

I do not think there can be any objection on the part of anyone to the consideration of this bill. It is meant to correct an injustice worked upon a few natives of the Hawaiian Islands who undertook to take up homestead lands and whose cases were confused for them by the authorities themselves. They have complied with the law in every respect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon an interruption, I think this is a just bill, but some objection was made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Does the Senator know whether or not he has abated that objection?

Mr. NEW. I never have heard of that objection. I do not think the Senator ever objected to this bill. I think perhaps the Senator from Utah is confused as to the bill to which the Senator from Montana did object. He never has interposed any objection to the consideration of this bill, so far as I know, and I am quite certain that that is the case.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I may suggest that I recall that the Senator from Montana did object to a measure granting certain franchises in Honolulu.

Mr. NEW. Oh, yes; I recall that perfectly, but that was an entirely different bill. I will say for the information of the Senator from Utah, if he desires further light on this subject——

Mr. KING. Oh, no; I will say to the Senator that I am familiar with the bill, and I think it ought to pass.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7881) to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to ratify the agreements of certain persons made with the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii, and to issue land patents to those eligible under the terms of said agreements, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the governor of the Territory of Hawaii is hereby authorized and directed to ratify and carry into effect the agreements made by the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii with certain homesteaders, referred to in the resolution adopted by the senate and house of representatives of the Territory of Hawaii, April 26, 1917; also to issue land patents to those living up to the terms of the agreements when the same have been completed; also to issue land patents to those who have already complied with all the terms of their agreements, and to ratify and confirm the land patents already issued to homesteaders in accordance with the provisions of the resolution of the senate and house of representatives, Territory of Hawaii, of April 26, 1917, above mentioned.

SEC. 2. That the governor shall report to the Secretary of the Interior the action taken by him hereunder.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. B. WATERMAN.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, some days ago—the last day we worked on the calendar—the Senate passed over Order of Business 467, Senate bill 1059, for the relief of J. B. Waterman. That is a bill in which I am very much interested, but it was passed over on objection of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who desired an opportunity to examine it. I wondered whether he had sufficiently examined it so that he would permit it to be taken up at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have asked for some additional information in regard to the bill. I have it on my desk. I shall be glad to have the Senator call up the bill for consideration on the next calendar day.

Mr. WILLIS. That will be satisfactory.

REVENUES AND EXPENSES OF RAILROADS.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, on Monday last the Senate passed Senate resolution 257, which provided for printing as a Senate document volumes 3 and 4 of the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate on the railroad question. Before introducing that resolution I made inquiries which showed, as I thought, that it was authorized as to cost; but it seems that the cost will be in excess of the amount which, under the law, can be expended for the printing of a document. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate reconsider the vote by which that resolution was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the Senate adopted the resolution will be reconsidered. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I desire to say that I have made closer inquiry, and I find that one of these volumes—volume 4—can be printed easily within the limit of expense allowed in the case of such documents. I therefore send to the desk a substitute resolution which I ask unanimous consent to have considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed as a Senate document volume 4 of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate, held pursuant to Senate resolution No. 23, Sixty-seventh Congress, relative to the revenues and expenses of railroads which report to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that 2,500 additional copies be printed for the Senate document room.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not intend to object either to the present consideration of this resolution or to its adoption; but I think I ought to state in connection with the adoption of this resolution, if it be adopted, that this request must inevitably be followed by other requests which will include other parts of the testimony which has been taken under the original resolution to which reference has been made.

The committee of which I am chairman has been taking testimony now for 10 months—not all the while, of course, but we have taken a great deal of testimony—and I suppose that the evidence, broadly speaking, presents the most complete statement of railroad earnings and railroad expenses and railroad history that can be found in any one volume or any one place. If this part of the testimony is made a public document—and I have no objection in the world—then when other requests are made that other parts of the testimony shall also be made public documents, I shall feel constrained to insist that those requests be granted, in order to be entirely fair to all the interests that are involved in this investigation.

The testimony as a whole is very voluminous. I do not know how much it would cost to reprint all of it, but it would cost a very considerable sum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am a member of the committee which held the investigation. The subject matter of the investigation is one of very vast importance. I wish the railroad question were settled, if it could be settled right, but it is still a question which is before the Congress and before the country. These hearings have been held. It is not alone for the benefit of the members of the committee that the hearings were held. The reflected view of the country should be had on these hearings. Some of the testimony which has come before the committee I can agree with; other testimony I disagree with; but I would like to hear the viewpoint of those who are interested, and unless we publish these hearings I do not see that there is a great deal accomplished by having the hearings.

It is not like an ordinary case. These hearings involve almost a scientific determination of this question, and I think the best evidence of the necessity of the publication is the desire on the part of people to read it. It may cost a good deal of money, and I am in thorough accord with the idea of cutting down expenses where we can; but this is not a dead issue; it is a live one. The purpose of the committee in taking the testimony was to make it public, and unless we are going to allow a resolution of this kind to go through, when there is a real demand for the testimony, which I have no doubt is backed up, or the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] would not request it, there is no necessity for holding hearings. So I think the resolution should be agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not objecting to the adoption of this resolution, but it must be remembered that all this testimony has been printed and is now in print, but all the copies which the law allows to be printed have been exhausted. There is a very general, widespread demand for this testimony. One class of people want one volume of it; another class of people want another volume of it.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Is the Senator informed as to what it would cost per thousand to reprint this testimony, it being in print already?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I am not informed. There is one volume, and possibly a little more, which comprises the evidence of a single witness, covering 450 or 500 pages, somewhere in that neighborhood. Certain unions which are particularly interested in the testimony of that witness, who was a very highly accomplished economist, ordered fifteen or twenty thousand copies of it, paying for it, of course; but in printing that number the type, if it be called type, was worn out, and all of it will have to be reset. So I can not give an estimate of the cost of reprinting the whole of the testimony.

Mr. KENDRICK. I want to say to my colleague that the estimate given to me of the cost of printing 2,500 copies of volume 4 is $414.80. I have no objection to a reprint of the entire testimony given before the committee, of course, but this is the only part of the testimony for which I have had requests.

Mr. WARREN. I thank my colleague for that information. A continuous demand has come to my office for copies of the entire hearing, and I would be glad to know at the earliest opportunity what it would cost to print a very large number, for I am satisfied that the demand will be very great. I shall support the resolution of my colleague, and after that is disposed of I hope we may get further information as to what it would cost to reprint the whole testimony.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the Senator think it would be well to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing, which is supposed to look into all such matters for the Senate? I have no objection to the resolution, except that it does seem to me that the committee of the Senate which is supposed to advise the Senate with reference to such matters should give it consideration. It might be well, in considering it, to go into the question of printing some of the other testimony. The senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has just stated that he has had requests for other parts of the testimony.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has the Senator from Wyoming obtained an estimate of the cost of printing what he asks shall be printed?

Mr. KENDRICK. The estimate is $414.80 for this one volume. The Senate on last Monday authorized the publication of volumes 3 and 4, but I was informed later that the publication of those two volumes would cost an amount in excess of the $500 limit.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senate can expend only $500 for printing. A greater cost requires a concurrent resolution of the two Houses.

Mr. KENDRICK. I therefore ask the Senate to adopt this resolution instead, so that we can have volume 4 for immediate use. I have had a number of requests for it, and I find that almost every Senator with whom I have discussed it has also had requests for it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Was the resolution which was passed last Monday, and for which this is offered as a substitute, referred to the Committee on Printing and reported by that committee?

Mr. KENDRICK. It was passed without referring it to the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am very sorry that was done. I think all such resolutions ought to go to the Committee on Printing; but as the resolution has passed the Senate and the Senate now has reconsidered its action on that resolution, so as to consider a resolution which does not carry such a large appropriation, I shall not object to it at this time. Hereafter, however, if such a resolution is offered when I am on the floor, I think I shall insist that it shall go to the Committee on Printing, which is supposed to advise the Senate with reference to such matters.

Mr. KENDRICK. The only objection I would have to referring it to the committee is that it would delay the printing just that long. Demands have been coming to my office for these volumes for several weeks past.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] to the pending resolution.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, line 2, strike out the words "volumes 3 and" and insert the word "volume," so that it will read:

That there be printed as a Senate document volume 4 of the hearings, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 16, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. WALSH as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God, who knowest our necessities and art merciful to hear the humblest petition, bend over us, and may we speak to Thee even as we would to a dear earthly friend. Help us to live nobly, simply, and humbly; leave no need untouched. Meet us in the way of duty and make it plain and sure. Give us light and make the truth bare. Go where our thoughts go, into our business, into our social life, into our homes, and may we always keep Thee in heart and in life. O be with us every step of the road and never go away. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to—
Mr. SUTHERLAND for five weeks, on account of business.
Mr. MORGAN for five days, on account of illness.

ELECTIONS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following nominations for membership on the standing committees of the House and move the election of those nominated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming presents the following nominations to membership on the standing committees of the House, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

To be members of the Committee on Appropriations: HENRY Z. OSBORNE, of California; FRANK MURPHY, of Ohio.
To be a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, OGDEN L. MILLS, of New York.
To be a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, A. PIATT ANDREW, of Massachusetts.
To be a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, CYRENUS COLE, of Iowa.
To be a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, WALTER F. LINEBERGER, of California.
To be a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, MICHAEL J. HOGAN, of New York.
To be a member of the Elections Committee No. 1, HERBERT W. TAYLOR, of New Jersey.
To be a member of the Elections Committee No. 3, MARTIN C. ANSORGE, of New York.
To be chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, CLARENCE D. COUGHLIN, of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming, that the gentlemen named be elected to the committees named.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman whether or not the delay in the assignment to the Committee on Ways and Means of Mr. OGDEN MILLS until after the bonus bill had been reported out of that committee was at his request, or at the instigation of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. MONDELL. The election of these gentlemen to the committees for which they were nominated depended in a number of cases upon their resignation from other committees, and the presentation of the nominations has awaited the presentation and acceptance of the resignations by the House.

Mr. GARNER. But, as far as the record shows, I notice that on the morning before the bonus bill was reported out of the committee all of the resignations now being filed had been filed with the Speaker and had been accepted by the House, and it was currently reported, I will say to the gentleman, that the gentleman from Wyoming was keeping the gentleman from New York off the Committee on Ways and Means until the bonus bill had been reported. It was also rumored that the gentleman from New York had requested the gentleman from Wyoming to keep him off until after the vote had been taken. Which one of those is true, if either?

Mr. MONDELL. If one were to be interrogated in regard to all of the rumors that float about the cloakrooms, we would have time for little else. The floor leader being rather busy, did not find time to prepare and present the list until this morning. It was necessary to go over the resignations to see if they had all been turned in and accepted before the list could be presented.

Mr. GARNER. Then, if I understand the gentleman from Wyoming, one of the reasons why he did not submit the list at an earlier date was not the fact that he did not want Mr. OGDEN MILLS on the committee before the bonus bill was reported?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is inferring a very great deal.

Mr. GARNER. I am asking a question.

Mr. MONDELL. The list was presented as soon as convenient after it was prepared, and it was prepared as soon as possible after the resignations had been received.

Mr. GARNER. Did that influence the gentleman in delaying the preparation of the list?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman prepared the list as soon as it was convenient after the resignations had been received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming, that these gentlemen be elected to the committees named.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order previously agreed to, business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule is in order to-day, and the Clerk will call the roll of committees.

IMMIGRATION.

The Clerk called the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization I call up House joint resolution 279, to permit to remain within the United States certain aliens admitted temporarily under bond in excess of quotas fixed under authority of the immigration act of May 19, 1921.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington calls up House joint resolution 279, to permit to remain within the United States certain aliens admitted temporarily under bond in excess of quotas fixed under authority of the immigration act of May 19, 1921. This being on the Union Calendar, the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 279, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 279, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That aliens who entered the United States before March 1, 1922, in excess of quotas fixed under authority of the act entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved May 19, 1921, and were temporarily admitted under bond, may, if otherwise admissible, and if not subject to deportation for other causes, be permitted by the Secretary of Labor to remain in the United States without regard to the provisions of such act of May 19, 1921. In the case of any alien so permitted to remain the bond shall be canceled.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the figure "1" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "7."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Washington will have his hour. Will the members of the committee who made the minority report be recognized for the other hour?

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is being considered under the Calendar Wednesday rule permitting two hours of debate, one hour for and one hour against.

Mr. RAKER. I desire to be recognized in opposition to the bill, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be notified when I have used 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the resolution, I think, is simple and easily understood. It is necessary; it is humane; it is proper; and it is an aid rather than a hindrance to the great cause of the restriction of immigration. I desire to present a statistical statement, which, I think, will be of interest not only to the membership of the House but to the country at large. You will all remember that an act was passed May 19, 1921, less than a year ago, which changed the United States on short notice from an asylum or dumping ground for the rest of the world to a country with a plan of restricted immigration. That act has been in effect now since July 1 and 27 days in the previous June. It was a big act, a great step; it ended the asylum idea. The immigrants coming into the United States for the year ending June 30, 1921, were, in round numbers, 805,000. Under the 3 per cent act of May 19, 1921, there have been admitted as immigrants within the quota only 197,521 persons. There has been admitted within that same length of time in excess of the quota 2,453 persons. Nearly all of these excess admissions have been admitted for humane reasons, which I shall explain a little later. To have turned them back would have hurt the cause of restriction, in my opinion.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me finish the statistical statement first. There have been deported or sent away from the United States on account of excess of quotas from July 1 to February 28, or in eight months, 1,153 persons only.

What I want to call attention to is that, in spite of the enactment of the 3 per cent restriction act, which greatly limits immigration, there have not come to our doors great numbers in excess. There have come all told in excess of quota a total that will be found by adding 2,453 and 1,153, which shows, to me at least, that all concerned have made a sincere effort to keep within the quota limitations. I considered that a good showing. I myself was under the impression during the hearings which we held that large numbers had come to Ellis Island in excess of quotas and had failed of admission. I was mistaken, as the actual figures show.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In just a moment. We did not get the exact number or get the statistical report until quite recently, and the official figures showed us, as I say, that the number which came in excess and was not admitted was 1,153 persons. Now, there were admitted in excess of quota 2,453, and it is to make legal and give the Secretary of Labor the right to admit those who have been admitted temporarily under bond that we come to the House with this resolution. Note that these are to be admitted only if otherwise admissible. Account has been kept and reason could be shown for the admission of everyone who have been admitted, or who is otherwise qualified to be admitted under the permanent immigration law, and if not so qualified they are not admissible under this resolution.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Where did the gentleman get the information of the number he quoted under the quota law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I got the figures from the Commissioner of Immigration. They are in his office and available to all.

Mr. RAKER. How many were there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will hand the gentleman the slip, which shows the actual figures.

Mr. RAKER. I would rather have the gentleman's statement than the slip.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have stated it, but I will state it once more. The number of aliens deported on account of excess of quota from July 1 to February 28 was 1,153.

Mr. RAKER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Many persons fail to realize that the deportation of aliens is a serious matter; deportation is not done easily, as some people think, but under restriction of immigration deportations are being made more frequently and with more time for proper inquiry. This 3 per cent act, which has reduced immigration to date to 197,000 people in eight months, has afforded not only opportunity for closer examination of those who come to be admitted within the quota but has afforded opportunity for deportation of other aliens throughout the country who were entitled to be arrested and deported.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In just a minute. For the entire fiscal year ending July 1 last we deported for all causes 2,342 persons. Those were the ones deported throughout the country, picked up for deportable causes and deported—2,342. But between July 1 and December 31—that is, six months of the present fiscal year—we have deported, not counting those who have failed to get in on account of excess of quota, a total of 2,394, or more in six months than during the entire previous year. We are literally cleaning house. [Applause.]

Now, all who have followed this subject will remember when the quota act was written both the House and the Senate, and later the conferees of the two bodies, undertook in every possible way to find words by which a little margin could be provided for the Secretary of Labor so that he might take care of proper exemptions. We wanted the law to be humane.

It was not possible to find the words. The law requires the limit of admissions to be at a maximum 20 per cent per month per country. We proposed to make that monthly limit 15 per cent and let the Secretary withhold the 5 per cent. But if that had been in the law the 5 per cent would have been quickly absorbed. You will notice in some recommendations for amendment to the 3 per cent resolution which is now pending in the other body and which was passed in this body one recommendation indorsed by the Federal Council of Churches is that there be added to any restrictive immigration act the following:

A general clemency clause authorizing the Secretary of Labor to deal humanely with exceptional cases in order to avoid hardships amounting to inhumanity.

We have not been able to find quite the words in which to do that. We have had to depend on the ninth proviso of the third section of the Burnett Immigration Act, which authorizes the Secretary to admit temporarily, under bond, certain aliens. Under the old law, of course, that applied to the inadmissible. But I think it is properly applied now to those who have right and reason for appeal to remain in excess of quota, but, of course, if applied temporarily only, the time must come when they should go out. I think the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Davis, and the Assistant Secretary of Labor, Mr. Henning, have acted justly, literally, wisely, and with reason. Note that nearly all of these 2,400 cases which are to be covered by this resolution are cases which have been admitted for causes of extreme humanity.

Mr. LAYTON. What do you mean by that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I mean, for instance, a wife to join her husband. Perhaps the wife had been born in Poland and husband in Germany, and the Polish quota was exceeded, while the German quota was not. Perhaps, I mean a case where a family in transit, coming from Russia and being a whole year on the way, was detained a while in Turkey, and while there a child was born, and the child under the law is called a Turk and inadmissible if the Turkish quota is full. I refer, perhaps, to the four or five hundred cases which came on an American ship from over in the Asia Minor country somewhere, bringing four or five hundred Armenians, assuming that they would be admitted under the Armenian quota, which was not exhausted, but on arrival it is found that they were from Turkish Armenia and were to be counted under the quota for Turkey, which was exhausted. In that party there were many orphan children from 5 to 10 years of age, in charge of an English-speaking teacher from the Beirut College. To deport those children to Constantinople under any circumstances would have been the height of inhumanity. In fact, it could not have been done, in my opinion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Are the facts which the gentleman is recounting here in the hearings before the committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They are scattered all through the hearings. In an effort to perfect the quota act there were extensive hearings, and in an effort to make various amendments to that act these facts appeared all through those extensive and exhaustive hearings.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But no hearings were held on this resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not on this particular resolution, but on an earlier resolution of similar import. In every effort to amend the 3 per cent act we ran into hearings on this phase of the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that the committee held extensive hearings on the resolution that was passed here a few weeks ago extending the 3 per cent quota act for another year?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is what I referred to. And still earlier we held, after five months of operation of the 3 per cent act, hearings on the operation of it, and many of these cases I mention you will find described in detail in the pamphlet entitled "Operation of the Quota Act for Five Months."

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. What provision was made for these four or five hundred Armenian children?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do not misunderstand me. They were not all Armenian children. They were mostly women and children, and quite a large party of orphan children. And let me tell you something before it gets out of my mind. There are in Armenia to-day 200,000 orphan children. We talk about the United States as an asylum. Even those most interested in those children know it would not be possible for us to bring any considerable number of them to the United States, no matter how much it is desired.

Mr. LAYTON. You imagine that there are many millions of orphan children in the world to-day?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LAYTON. What I am trying to get at is this: The gentleman said unless this bill was passed these Turkish Armenians would be deported and would go somewhere, probably falling into the hands of the Turks, which would be a matter of great inhumanity.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The charge was made literally in these hearings by Armenian ministers here that we deported some 27 or 37 who were, upon reaching Constantinople, outraged and murdered.

Mr. LAYTON. Who is going to take care of those over here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The bond has been put up. They are admitted temporarily under bond. Church organizations and charitable people stand ready to adopt them, and in some cases they have done so or have guaranteed that they would do so. Our committee had before it a plan by which orphans might be admitted under sufficient bond to provide that they should not become public charges before they became of age, but that of itself was impracticable, because if they came in great number it would be impossible for the United States to provide that they should not become "bound-out" children, such as we had a couple of generations ago.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I want to ask the gentleman, if this resolution is passed admitting those who are here illegally, what assurance has the Congress that immigrants in the future will not come in under the same circumstances?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Many of these cases developed at the expiration of the five months with the 20 per cent per month limitation. You will remember the law reads not to exceed 20 per cent a month. So the quotas of many countries ran out all in a lump just before Christmas. There was a considerable congestion and also a misunderstanding as to whether one was an exemption or a quota. That 20 per cent made the congestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will take five minutes more.

Now, then, the quotas having been completely exhausted from many countries, the number coming in is very much smaller; in fact, it is almost nil.

For instance, last week, covered in for the week from March 1 to March 7, 10. This present week, 4. From countries where the immigration would have come there is only now and then an exceptional demand for admission, owing to a misunderstanding as to the total count or as to place of birth. The number arriving at Ellis Island last week was less than a thousand. The number detained at Ellis Island yesterday was less than 300. But still there is an occasional excess of quota. For instance, the other day there was a woman from the Azores Islands with five or six children, two or three of which were born abroad, and three or four born here, American citizens; she went a few months ago back for a visit, which is permitted under the law, and while she was away a baby was born. She returned to Ellis Island, herself admissible under the law, but with a 2-months-old baby in her arms, born in Portuguese territory, and the Portuguese quota was exhausted months ago. Her 2-months-old baby is a Portuguese immigrant in excess of quota and is not admitted. The law was new, an untried instrument, its effect changing the United States from that of an asylum to a country of restriction. We also require passport visés. Reservations were not made quickly. Our consular officers all over Europe were issuing passport visés in excess of the quotas. But they are not doing that now. Here was confusion as to the quotas and the figures given out by us. All these things are now working more and more on a uniform method.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not think the steamship companies want to understand it very much.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, if we succeeded in cutting off immigration from what it was before to 200,000, we have not stretched it so badly.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not know whether the gentleman has covered this by the statistics of how many people will be admitted by reason of the enactment of this law in addition to what are already here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Less than 3,000 instead of a possible 600,000 or 700,000.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the gentleman think that these men——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They are not men. Most of them are mothers and children, and grandmothers.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Well, will not positions be taken from our people here for them? I think we have enough idle people in this country now under this Republican administration without bringing these people here.

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GENSMAN. Would a man who came into this country by way of the Mexican border and who was under bond be admitted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not at all. This resolution says "otherwise admissible." No insane man can be admitted, no sick person, no defective, no helpless dependent.

Mr. GENSMAN. But would a man be entitled to be admitted who got over the Mexican border, and was captured and put under bond? Would he be admitted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not if he came in illegally. And before this 3 per cent act starts on another year's operation I shall place before you an amendment requiring that the residence of such immigrants in Mexico and Canada shall be five years instead of one year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at the outset to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I ask not to be interrupted until I have completed my statement, because the time is very short.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] do constitute something of an argument against the enactment of the act of May 19, 1921, and much of an argument in favor of its amendment, but no argument against its enforcement.

The chairman and majority of the committee will have to hurry this resolution through before other shiploads of immigrants excluded by the law arrive, embarrassing them with the question whether their unlawful admission shall be charged to this backdown or breakdown resolution or the third one which must follow it soon. New admissions are being made in violation of the law from time to time. Up to and including October 31, 1921, according to official reports, such admissions numbered 843. Up to the end of November 9, 968 were admitted. November 16, a week later, it stood at 1,195. From that time to this every weekly report has shown additional illegal admissions, until the number is now three times what it was four months ago.

Moreover, I object to this method of handling the situation, because it keeps the gentleman from Washington busy writing these resolutions ratifying illegal admissions made for the accommodation of alien groups and steamship lines. I now hold in my hand several such resolutions presented by the gentleman. They are House joint resolution 153, House joint resolution 237, House joint resolution 273, and House joint resolution 279—all to the same general effect, introduced at different times. The two last admit many aliens who could not be admitted under the former.

I can fish into the basket almost any day and take out a resolution by the chairman of the committee ratifying the illegal admissions of aliens, the later ones being more and more liberal to the aliens and steamship lines.

Since I am fully convinced that such resolutions go far toward breaking down the law, and since the Commissioner General of Immigration has advised the committee that a similar resolution, which did not ratify or authorize the admission of more than one-third as many as this does, tended to break down the law, I think these deathblows should be as few and infrequent as possible.

Speaking of House joint resolution 237, one of this troupe, the chairman himself asked the Commissioner General of Immigration the following question:

> Do you think a resolution of that kind running for a time coincident with the emergency act would break the act down?
> Mr. HUSBAND. Very largely. (Hearings of Dec. 19, 1921, p. 215.)

The act of 1917, embodying the general immigration laws, contains the following:

> That the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall issue rules and prescribe conditions, including exaction of such bonds as may be necessary, to control and regulate the admission and return of otherwise inadmissible aliens applying for temporary admission. (Immigration Laws, p. 8.)

The following is one of the rules for the enforcement of the clause quoted:

> In cases in which aliens who are mandatorily excluded from permament entry apply for the privilege of entering the United States temporarily, they shall be required to show that their temporary entry is an urgent necessity or that unusual and grave hardship would result from a denial of their request. (Immigration Laws, pp. 57–58.)

This is the provision under which they have been pretending to admit these people.

First, I call your attention to the fact that it applies only to people who are inadmissible under the immigration laws. No man who can be legally admitted under the immigration laws, the act of 1917, can be permitted to enter the United States temporarily under this clause.

Second, the "admission and return" are connected and always jointly provided for. The idea of admission under it—in fact permanent—is inconsistent with the terms of the law itself and foreign to the very purpose of it. If an alien was critically ill on board ship and could not be admitted under the immigration laws, he could be placed in a hospital within the custody and under the control of the immigration authorities and treated until he could be deported. Other emergency situations of a similar nature were foreseen and provided for. But the very fact that none but inadmissible aliens were governed by the provision certainly excludes the idea that admissions expected to be made permanent could be made under it.

Neither are these people admissible under the 3 per cent act of May, 1921, which provides:

That the number of aliens of any nationality who may be admitted under the immigration laws of the United States in any fiscal year shall be limited to 3 per cent of the number of foreign-born persons of such nationality resident in the United States as determined by the United States census of 1910.

Note that this applies only to aliens admissible under the act of 1917. The clause quoted from that act applies only to those who are inadmissible under it.

The 1921 act further provides:

When the maximum number of aliens of any nationality who may be admitted in any fiscal year under this act shall have been admitted all other aliens of such nationality, except as otherwise provided in this act, who may apply for admission during the same fiscal year shall be excluded.

It will be noted that this provides that all aliens who may be admitted under the act of 1917 in excess of the 3 per cent limitation "shall be excluded."

There you have it.

First. These people have to be inadmissible under the 1917 act in order to come within this clause in that act relating to temporary admission.

Second. That those admitted under the act of 1917 shall not exceed the 3 per cent, so that if these people were legally admitted under the first act they are mandatorily excluded by the second act.

Their admission, as has been done recently, is not even an evasion of the law. It is a flagrant violation of it.

I take the immigration law seriously. I take all laws seriously. Anything else is bolshevism. The act of May, 1921, should be repealed or amended or enforced as it is. House joint resolution No. 279, and all of the several companion resolutions presented by the gentleman from Washington for the same purpose, contemplate neither.

There is no reason for this course. There is no excuse for it. The excuse which they present—and it is only an excuse—is that the law works a hardship on those who come in conflict with it. That is exactly what all law does. The laws of nature visit harsh consequences upon those who come in conflict with them. The laws of civilized people do. Our quarantine laws work hardships on individuals, very painful ones. Our penal laws work hardships on criminals and innocent members of their families, often extending through a lifetime. Our draft laws, which call individual citizens from the safe and peaceful walks of life to the conflict, suffering, and death, inseparable from military service, work hardships on the men and on their loved ones at home.

The gentlemen say that we can not deal with immigrants as with sacks of flour. Law rarely deals with sacks of flour. It usually deals with men and women and visits its consequences, its painful punishments, upon men and women. When the Government of the United States refuses to enforce its law because somebody suffers as a consequence, those who administer it should have repeated in their ears the old, old saw:

No man e'er felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law.

But it is pretended—and it is no more than a pretense—that the 3 per cent act of 1921 is especially bad, so bad that it should not be enforced uniformly, in that it works hardships. In that respect it is not different from other immigration laws, all of which have worked hardships in hundreds of thousands of cases. But these gentlemen seem to think that because this law was passed by the Sixty-seventh Congress and approved by the present administration that it should be subjected to all kinds of contemptuous treatment. It is the child of the present Congress and administration, and may be suffering from "inherited constitutional psychopathic inferiority," but since it is the law it should have the respect at least of the Congress that enacted it and the administration which approved it and is charged with its enforcement. But is it peculiar in producing cases of hardship? The law as it stood for 20 years, beginning in 1901, worked hardships in that it divided families, turned back many people who wanted to come in, who suffered and even died because they were deported. They were the most unfortunate of people, too. For instance, during that time, 295 poor idiots were turned back into the wretchedness of Europe; 445 imbeciles went back in their weakness; 299 feeble-minded were turned back; 2,128 insane were rejected or deported. Who is more unfortunate than an insane man? Unfortunate epileptics numbering 369 were rejected or deported; 18,813 persons, who were suffering from constitutional, mental, or nervous inferiority and other things of kindred nature, were rejected or deported after having been admitted.

Persons to the number of 37,719 suffering from loathsome diseases, sick and diseased as they were, were turned back into the sources of their infection, doubtless to die there. Orphans, or children under 16 years of age, unaccompanied by parents, numbering 5,560, were turned back or deported from the United States to the wretchedness of the Old World without a guardian. Can you imagine anything more unfortunate? People numbering 154,156, who were so poor, so helpless, so friendless, so incompetent, that even in the abundant opportunity of America, they were liable to become a public charge, were sent back to Europe, where life is so much harder and where, doubtless, tens of thousands of them begged in wretchedness for a while and then died and were buried in potter's fields. The figures from which these totals are made will be found on pages 117 and 118 of 1921 report of Commissioner General of Immigration. But the laws under which these people were excluded and deported were passed under the administrations of McKinley and Cleveland and Roosevelt and Wilson, and therefore were taken seriously and were understood as having been made to be enforced.

I object to the favoritism practiced in the admission of these people. The Commissioner General of Immigration testified before your committee:

The reason is that the law is an uncertain quantity. It is recognized as such because it has—they have brought people over who were in excess of the quota and they have been admitted, and they have brought others in excess of the quota and they have been sent back, and others have been admitted temporarily or something like that. (See p. 218, hearings, Dec. 19.)

Is the National Government to openly practice favoritism in the administration of its law? To admit that it is doing so is to admit that it has been debauched. I warn you and the country that an effort has been made, with a regrettable degree of success, to demoralize and debauch the Immigration Service and break down the immigration laws. [Applause.]

I shall here attempt to expose that effort and show the measure of success which it has met.

1. I read you a telegram placed in the hearings by the chairman of the committee:

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, December 19, 1921.

Representative ALBERT JOHNSON,
Chairman House Immigration Committee,
the Capitol, Washington, D. C.:

Mary Olexa, among Hungarian immigrants detained for deportation at Ellis Island, comes to her uncle, Frank Vasko, one of the best known American citizens of Hungarian birth in the Mahoning Valley, willing and able to take care of her, and file bond to guarantee that she does never become a public charge. Vasko is large property owner here and resides at 1020 Ford Avenue. Other cases are still under investigation. Kindly try to arrange for her admission as a special favor.

AMERICAN HUNGARIAN JOURNAL,
N. GROSSHANDLER, General Manager.

(Hearings, Dec. 19, 1921, pp. 223, 224.)

We have many of these.

Note that many such telegrams were sent to the chairman.

Mr. Henning, the Assistant Secretary of Labor, administering the immigration laws, said:

We have received the same telegram. We have received many of them exactly like that. (Hearings, Dec. 19, 1921, p. 224.)

I wonder if they were exactly like it in wanting these people admitted because their relatives were large property owners? I wonder if they were exactly like it in asking the admission of these aliens "as a special favor." I wonder if they were exactly like it in being sent by managers of the foreign-language press? I want you to note that this telegram was dated December 19, 1921, and that about that time great numbers came to the chairman of the committee and to the Assistant Secretary of Labor administering the immigration law.

Next, I call your attention to this statement by the Assistant Secretary of Labor, Mr. Henning, speaking of the time when he was receiving these telegrams. He said:

Just as I was trying to get out some Congressman's stenographer came in with an armful of them and I went through them hurriedly. (Hearings, p. 224, Dec. 19.)

In the same connection I call attention to the following language by the chairman of the committee, as reported on page 235 of the same hearings:

* * * Neither do I think we are justified in leaving conditions just as they are, with Members of Congress working for their constituents, with Senators working for their constituents, and further pressing the department.

Next, I call your attention to the fact that on that very morning of December 19 a whole battery of steamship-line magnates filed in and occupied places in the committee room. That day they appeared before the committee urging the passage of House joint resolution 237. There were Mr. Franklin, Mr. Farley, Mr. Sanford, and other big ones, and they came, or some of them came, from the committee room and took seats in the gallery to watch the gentleman from Washington "play ball." On that very day House joint resolution 237, by the gentleman from Washington, was presented on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Washington, who did not take time to have it printed. When I first saw it after the House met on December 17 it was written with a lead pencil. When I saw it next it was typewritten. He presented it in that form, but it had to be withdrawn at the request of the Speaker because it interfered with other business. It was printed the next day. The telegrams from the foreign-language press and the pressure by the steamship lines, the appeals to Congressmen and their pressure on the department, all together brought results that very day, or else there was a remarkable coincidence.

Next, I call your attention to the following, which appeared in the New York Times of December 25:

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, December 24.

Representative ALBERT JOHNSON, Republican, of Washington, will introduce a resolution, when the House convenes January 5, to make permanent the temporary 90-day release granted yesterday to 1,100 aliens held at Ellis Island because quotas for their countries under the immigration law had been filled, according to a telegram from Mr. JOHNSON received here to-day by E. N. Meymenyi, editor of a Hungarian-language newspaper which has been active in urging release of aliens.

Gentlemen, these foreign-language alien groups, represented by the foreign-language newspapers and the steamship companies, and the pressure of Representatives here who feel constrained to serve their foreign-born constituencies, subject your committee and your Department of Labor to more pressure than is safe. The American people should know when such unholy influences are bearing so heavily upon their Government. [Applause.]

The steamship group sat in the gallery all the afternoon of December 19 and left looking "real disgusted" when the gentleman from Washington did not get action on his House joint resolution 237. That night the scene was transferred to the committee room. I was there; the steamship group filed in again; Assistant Secretary of Labor Henning came; Mr. Husband, the Commissioner General of Immigration, came. I do not approve of his course, but I sympathize with his position. He is a subordinate under great pressure suffering from lack of support. He told the committee in the face of the steamship people and in the face of his superior, Mr. Henning, that that resolution would largely break down the immigration laws.

Mr. Farley said that he was for it, and that Mr. Franklin, the president of the International Mercantile Merchant Marine, was for it. Mr. Henning, the Assistant Secretary of Labor, said he was for it. It being the chairman's own output, he was for it. Mr. Henning showed a disposition to be critical of his subordinate, Mr. Husband, because he said it would break down the immigration laws. Here is what Mr. Henning said about the attitude of Mr. Husband in opposing it:

* * * I am for it. Mr. Husband always has some one he can pass the buck to. But when it gets to me my back is against the wall. I do not know who to pass the buck to.

The CHAIRMAN. I am with you. (Hearings, p. 224.)

That probably made Mr. Husband feel lonely. I do not know whether the chairman meant that he was with Mr. Henning in his criticism of Mr. Husband or whether he was with Mr. Henning in his effort to find somebody to whom to pass the buck. I do know that he is now helping Mr. Henning, after you have excluded, to pass the buck back to you and make you and the President say whether or not you meant what you said in the passage and approval of the act.

While this hearing was drifting in the direction indicated by these quotations, the chairman of the committee remarked:

I can readily see why Mr. Husband doesn't want to let it go. [Referring to the 3 per cent law.] It is Mr. Husband's baby, line for line.

Mr. BOX. I think Mr. Husband is trying to carry out the law, and that he hasn't any pride of authorship in it. (Hearings, p. 223.)

Since I made this offhand remark I have become convinced that because of a lack of support Mr. Husband is not enforcing the law steadily.

Gentlemen, my fear—my conviction—is that certain foreign-born and un-American groups in New York and elsewhere, the steamship line managers, and perhaps other powers have very largely debauched your Immigration Service at certain of your greater ports, and that men and their friends are literally buying their way into the United States. It is my conviction, based on a careful study of what I have observed. I do not pretend that I can prove this, but I warn you and the country that I believe it is true, and direct attention to it in the hope that it can be discovered and corrected. [Applause.]

My more immediate purpose is to show that demoralization does actually exist in Washington—that it has gotten into Congress—as evidenced by this resolution and the facts I have stated. For instance, the committee amendment proposed, changing the date from March 1 to March 7, has no purpose other than to admit some people in whom the gentleman from New York, the Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL, is specially interested.

I regret to have to advise you that I am no longer able to rely on the correctness of the reports that come from the Bureau of Immigration. They issue weekly reports showing how many excess admissions there are. Up to the close of December 21, 1921, the number of these as stated in this official report was 1,456. On December 24 and 25 they admitted from 900 to above 1,200, and yet the official report showing the total excess up to and including December 31 showed only 1,597 in all, or an increase of only 141 within a period within which there had been from 900 to above 1,200. I crave your patience while I give you the basis for this statement.

The New York Times of December 25 contained the following item:

Of the 1,100 immigrants detained on Ellis Island as excess quota, whose release Secretary Davis ordered on Friday morning, only a few hospital cases remained last night.

The entire article bears that out and shows that about 1,100 were admitted at that port at that time, but it may be said that this is only a newspaper report. We will see, then, what Mr. Husband said about it at another time and place. I read from the hearings of December 14 (p. 209):

Mr. BOX. About how many are there?

Mr. HUSBAND. Well, at Ellis Island specifically there are about 1,125 to-day. There are perhaps about 75 at Boston. Now, the difficulty is this: These people are there almost permanently. At least these 1,125 have been sifted down to about the last limit, and they have got to stay there until they are deported.

The CHAIRMAN. When you have sifted out all that you can, you have about 1,125 left?

Mr. HUSBAND. About 1,125. That is the residue of a very much larger number.

Mr. SIEGEL. There are 1,125 at Ellis Island and about 75 at Boston?

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. A total of about 1,200?

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes; strictly quota cases. (Hearings, p. 209.)

Further down, as shown on page 210, Mr. Husband said:

They are all quota cases. There were more deportations, of course, but these are on account of the quota.

Now, I call your attention to the order under which they were admitted and remind you that this order admits all who were then at Ellis Island, all who were then at the Boston station, all who were then at all other seaports, and all who should thereafter arrive on the 24th or 25th day of December, 1921, at any of the seaports of the United States. We had 1,200 at the New York and Boston immigration stations, according to the statement of Mr. Husband, plus the number then at all other stations, plus the number everywhere on shipboard, plus the number arriving at all other ports, during December 24 and 25.

Besides that number at the station at New York and Boston there were some 2,300 immigrants in the harbor of New York and about 380 "coming up the bay," many of whom were Hungarians, Italians, and Poles, and many of whom were probably quota cases. (See statement by Mr. Husband, hearings, Dec. 19, p. 208.)

The admission of all these and subsequent arrivals at these and all other ports on December 24 and 25 were covered by the order of admission, which I shall read you soon. Yet in the weekly report of the Commissioner General of Immigration the number of excess quota admissions was increased only 141 from December 21 to December 31, covering that very time. The number reported up to and including December 21 was 1,456, and up to and including December 31, 1,597. On December 24 and 25 all these new admissions were made. Yet the report of such admissions up to and including December 31 was only 141. The majority report says that these admissions numbered only 906. That is not correct, but it is more than six times the increase shown by the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration.

Then the increases ran along at about the normal rate which had characterized these admissions before Christmas. Each report stating:

Total excesses up to and including January 4, up to and including January 18, up to and including January 25, up to and including February 8.

The total increase from December 31 to February 8 was 313, about the normal rate of increase. Then, on February 28, 671 were added. But, making no allowance for the normal increase which had gone on before Christmas, the total number of excess admissions from December 21 to February 28 is less than those shown to have been admitted at New York and Boston December 24 and 25.

The report of the committee accompanying this bill has the same unfortunate weakness of not stating the facts. I will undertake to show this by its own contents. I read you two sentences:

To avoid great hardships the Secretary of Labor ordered releases under conditions stated above. (Majority report, p. 2.)

Then above that I read the following:

All these temporary admissions were made on individual showings.

Now, gentlemen, listen to this reading:

To officers of the United States Immigration Service:

By direction of Secretary, aliens now being held in detention all seaports solely because in excess of quota, and those who may arrive on or before the 25th instant and be so held are hereby landed for a period of 90 days on execution of their personal bonds or personal bonds relatives, with additional understanding that bonds with qualified sureties may later be required.

This order will not apply to those seeking admission and who are therefore in detention. Expedite to fullest possible extent release for all aliens who may be affected by this decision.

W. W. HUSBAND,
Commissioner General.

(P. 2, majority committee report.)

That order includes the 1,200 who were at the stations in New York and Boston, and, in addition, all quota cases among the Hungarians, Poles, and Italians in the harbor and coming up the bay at New York, and all who might be on the sea on December 24 and December 25, and all who might thereafter arrive at any seaport of the United States. Yet the committee in its report tells the House that "all these temporary admissions were made on individual showings."

You may wonder why House joint resolution No. 237 was not presented for final action and why subsequent ones had to be introduced. Well, I shall state to you the effect of the two resolutions, and you will have to form your own conclusions as to the reason for the abandonment of House joint resolution No. 237 and the subsequent introduction of House joint resolution No. 273 and House joint resolution No. 279.

House joint resolution No. 237, presented on December 19, it was found on a hearing before the committee would not let in all of these aliens in whose behalf the steamship companies and the alien groups were working so vigorously. It provided for the admission of cases the exclusion of which would work great hardships upon people having certain blood relatives in the United States. The hardships were the excuse for all these resolutions, but it was later found that even House joint resolution No. 237 would exclude a lot of these aliens because they could not show the facts which are made an excuse for these resolutions—that is, extreme hardship and certain relationship. Concerning House joint resolution No. 237 the testimony is as follows:

Mr. BOX. How many of these that you have in port now would be released by this resolution?

Mr. HENNING. I should say one-third.

Mr. BOX. About one-third. You would send two-thirds of these urgent cases back, then?

Mr. HENNING. Yes. (Hearings, pp. 227–228.)

These cases are spoken of as urgent ones involving hardship. The urgency is the urgent desire to get in the United States and the hardship consists of being excluded. Any such rule as that destroys the immigration law, and that as it is being done the people should know it. While Representatives and Senators having foreign-born constituencies, alien groups, the foreign-language press, and the steamship lines are exercising pressure which is proving too strong for their Government, the people should understand the situation, and I have spoken with that end in view. Nothing less important would have prompted me to have spoken as I have.

If the chairman and majority of the committee would go straight on in the preparation of proper restrictive and constructive legislation, and insisting on its uniform and steady enforcement, they would have my constant and best support. I believe they would have the support of the House. The approval of the country would be assured.

But this situation deeply disturbs me. [Applause.]

Mr JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is very hard, indeed, to take issue with men with whom you entirely agree on most of their theses. The three members who signed the minority report are men of the same views as mine. We only differ on what appears to me to be a very small matter of detail. It strikes me as unfortunate, indeed, that those of us who believe, with almost religious fervor, in strong restriction of immigration, who have worked for it in and out of Congress, who have spent most of our time discussing it from the public platform and endeavoring to arouse the country to the imminent dangers of the mongrelization of our American blood and the decay of our American ideals attendant upon the admission of vast alien hordes—it strikes me as unfortunate, I say, that we of identical views on the main point should now be split on such a minor matter as is here involved.

Up to 1907 the United States had no general law limiting immigration. In that year Congress passed the act excluding those who were likely to become a public charge, those who were insane or mentally deficient—polygamists, anarchists, and people who were the bearers of contagious diseases.

In 1917, under the leadership of that patriotic statesman from Alabama, the Hon. John Burnett, former chairman of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, Congress passed the literacy test law over the veto of President Wilson, after a similar bill had been vetoed in previous Congresses by Presidents Taft and Cleveland.

In 1921 the last preceding Congress took the great step of the 3 per cent limitation law, cutting down the number of admissible aliens of any nationality to 3 per cent of the unnaturalized aliens of that nationality residing in the United States according to the 1910 census. The House of Representatives of the present Congress has passed a resolution extending that law for another year from June 30, 1922. We expect that the Senate will soon agree. The 3 per cent law is not perfect. It was not exactly the kind of a restrictive measure which we presented to the House in the last Congress, but we hope and expect before this law, as so extended, runs through its second year that we shall pass, in the present Congress, a more permanent and constructive plan embodying some kind of selection on the other side, a problem which is hedged about with many difficulties affecting our foreign relations.

For 10 years prior to the act of 1921 our immigration approximated a million a year. In 1908 it got up to 1,300,000, more than 100,000 a month. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, which included 27 days under the 3 per cent law, it was less than 900,000, but this was due largely to the destruction of ships, to the very low value of money in Europe, and to the inability of foreign-born people resident in America to get money to their relatives who wished to come. There are now plenty of ships to bring them, and plenty of money is being sent to them to make up for the low rate of exchange of foreign money. And those of us who have studied the subject at all are certain that without the 3 per cent law our immigration in the current fiscal year would considerably exceed 2,000,000.

In the eight months of its operation the 3 per cent law has cut immigration down to less than 200,000, and right now through the operation of the same law immigration has dwindled to less than 1,000 a week.

All of our restrictive immigration law, except as applied to orientals, has been made in the last 15 years, and in this present fiscal year we have cut immigration down to one-fifth of its former annual amount, and I believe to less than one-tenth of its reasonably to be anticipated amount.

Now, in changing to an entirely new and drastic system there has been a little margin which could not be taken care of by the new law. It is a very small margin, about 1½ per cent of the total number who have been admitted under the new law, and the purpose of this resolution to-day is to take care of that small margin.

It consists of 2,453 people who have already been admitted temporarily under bond by the Secretary of Labor to avoid extreme hardship and suffering in individual cases. The cases are those of people coming from countries which supposed—in some cases through our own error—that they had a quota left and where it was afterwards discovered that the quota had been exhausted. There are some Armenians who came because the quota from Armenia was not exhausted, but who found that having been born in Turkey they were Turks, and the Turkish quota was exhausted. Many of these Armenians were orphan children. If we send them back, we would simply be sending them to their death. There are cases of wives, husbands, parents, and minor children so admitted, notwithstanding the quota was exhausted, in order to join their families. There are cases of babies born in a country whose quota was exhausted while their mothers were en route here from a country whose quota was not exhausted. All of the 2,453 cases are cases of manifest equities in favor of the aliens who have been so admitted, and it was practically inevitable that there should have been such cases when we changed to an entirely new system, especially at a time when the very boundaries of the countries from which these people came were not settled.

Now, the three gentlemen who signed the minority report of our committee and who are here on the floor leading the opposition to this resolution are ardent advocates of restriction of immigration. They have voted for each of the restrictive measures I have mentioned which came up during their respective terms in Congress. These gentlemen, as you know, are all judges—Judge RAKER, Judge WILSON, and Judge BOX. As you look at them sitting here they are men of the most amiable and humane appearance in the world, and I know from my several years' acquaintance with them that that is in fact their character. But somehow when they get into the House considering a proposition of this sort involving a few hundred unfortunate people they seem to be possessed with the idea that they must have a kind of Rhadamanthean severity.

Rhadamanthus, as you will remember, is described in Greek mythology as the particularly hard-boiled magistrate who presided as the chief justice of the supreme court of hell. There were—the coincidence is a little singular—three of those unrelenting judges, the associate members of the bench being Minos and Æacus. Of course I do not want to suggest that at any time except the present moment my kindly judicial friends from California, Louisiana, and Texas possess any of the characteristics of those mythical judges. Neither do I want to suggest any comparison between the territorial jurisdiction of the court of Rhadamanthus and the place where these three colleagues of mine are now delivering their opinions. But exactly that comparison will occur to some two thousand poor people if the House does not pass this resolution to-day.

Let us see how our congressional judges have steeled their hearts to the performance of the task which they have set for themselves at this hour.

My friend from Texas, Judge Box, stands up here and talks about this exception, this act of Congress, as a violation of law. I am reminded of two Presidents of the United States who, in a sense, violated the law of this country—President Lincoln, when he pardoned several boys, soldiers in the service of their country who were condemned to be shot because they had violated the Articles of War in sleeping at their posts in time of war. President Wilson violated the law in the same way in pardoning several men. I do not really believe that the gentlemen now opposing this resolution, who have been distinct ornaments to the bench, have always practiced such extreme severity in the business of their own courts. I am reminded of the words of that great philosopher, the Bard of Avon, who looked at humanity with a clear and at the same time a humane eye, and said—this is from Measure for Measure, an appropriate source since we are considering a numerical measure of immigration:

> Not the king's crown, nor the deputed sword,
> The marshal's truncheon, nor the judge's robe,
> Become them with one half so good a grace
> As mercy does.

Now, what are we trying to do here to-day, gentlemen? We are trying to make, in the interest of mercy, a variation of about 1¼ per cent in the number admissible under the 3 per cent law. To be sure that is a larger variation than we allow in the case of the prohibition law, but that deals with things and, as my friend from Texas remarks, we are dealing now with human beings. We are asking to let in 2,400 people who have already come, who have been admitted, on the ground of particular hardship.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. I will.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Is it the gentleman's position that these people were admitted legally?

Mr. VAILE. Certainly.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Do I understand the gentleman to take the position that there was any discretion whatever from the administrative standpoint to admit people after the quota was full?

Mr. VAILE. I do not know that I can answer the question to the gentleman's satisfaction, and I am not sure that I can answer it to my own satisfaction, but was there any discretion in the Presidents of the United States in pardoning young men condemned to be shot for sleeping at their posts? We are by this measure legalizing the action of the administration in admitting them. This is to remove the doubt on the subject, if there be any.

Mr. BURROUGHS. It is my understanding that the President of the United States at the time he pardoned these young men had full authority to grant a pardon, and that it was not in violation of any law.

Mr. VAILE. We are asking Congress to exercise its undoubted authority to remove any question of illegality from these particular admissions. As a matter of fact, we do somewhat similar things every day. We pass bills for claims against the Government; we pass private pension bills; we pass bills granting homestead or other rights in the public lands—all for the benefit of people who can not bring their cases directly within the provisions of some general statute, but who do exhibit strong circumstances disclosing a moral or equitable right which we decide to recognize.

Nor do I think that the chairman of this committee should be criticized for busying himself humanely in drawing resolutions to cover such cases as those presented by this resolution. This is the first of such resolutions to be presented, except one, and that was merely in favor of people who started when the 3 per cent law became operative and who were found to be coming in excess of the monthly quota. These were, of course, charged against the quota for succeeding months, and are not involved here. This resolution does increase by the very small margin which I have indicated the quotas admissible from certain countries, but it will have no effect at all to increase the total number who would be admissible under the 3 per cent law from all countries, because a number of countries have not used and will not use anything like their full quota.

Nor is there any reasonable apprehension that we may have to present other relief bills of a similar nature to this, because the 3 per cent law is having its effect. It served notice on the world that the United States is henceforth not to be a dumping ground. That that notice has been heeded is shown by the fact that we are now getting in a week only about half as many immigrants as we formerly got in a day. Anyone could expect, and most everyone did expect, that there would be some slack to be taken up in the first year of the working of this law. We are not trying to take it up by indirection or evasion. We are coming to the House of Representatives with a full statement of the facts, asking for specific authority. We are by no means ashamed of the statement we present. On the other hand, we are proud that the 3 per cent law has worked so well as to require only an adjustment of approximately one and a quarter per cent of the less than 3 per cent already admitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman grant me a few minutes more?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute more.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I can not say much in one minute. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. No; I can not yield. In my one minute I shall ask these gentlemen, my friends, the minority of the committee, to heed again the Bard of Avon, and I slightly paraphrase the last line by changing the pronouns from the first to the second person:

> Having thus far proceeded—
> Unless thou thinkest me devilish—
> Is't not meet
> That you did amplify your judgment?

I hope, gentlemen of the minority, that you will do so, in the interests of humanity. These 2,400 unfortunate people will not flood the country and they are all admissible if they are excused, for the special reasons applicable to them, from the quota requirement.

Mr. GERNERD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Washington yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two minutes. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GERNERD. What assurances have we, if this be agreed to, that there will not be a repetition of it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have already stated that now passport visés are issued, as far as possible, in accordance with the limitation, and that is the principal assurance. Then there is the fact that the law is understood, and the fact that quotas are exhausted. I presume that under an absolute, literal interpretation of the quota law, when the quota has reached the point of exhaustion, there should be no appeal to the Secretary or to anyone else. I presume that we should send a man or a part of a man back, even if we have to cut him in two; that we should send his wife back and let the man in; but the appeals came from the fact that there were questions as to geographical boundaries, questions as to nationalities, questions as to the legal residence of children. We developed these appeals, and these 2,400 cases, all of which have been properly acted on. To say that I agreed with the Assistant Secretary of Labor is correct. Certainly I was with him. I am with him, and I am doing now what I conceive to be my duty in coming to Congress and asking Congress, if it so desires, to grant this act of grace, of mercy, and of right to 2,400 people at a time when we are reducing immigration from 1,000,000 a year to 250,000 a year, and that is all there is to it. [Applause.]

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, there is no question of more vital importance to the American public, and particularly the workers, than the subject of immigration. Before the war immigrants came to this country at the rate of a million a year for at least 10 years. During the war immigration subsided; the number coming in was very small. Since the war the number has been on the increase until during the last fiscal year over 800,000 again came here. The condition became alarming. It was necessary for Congress to act. Because of the conditions in Europe, a million or more, I may safely say, would have come to this country to escape from the chaotic conditions as a result of the war. The coming of large numbers would have been a calamity to the country and to the American workers as well as to the immigrants themselves. There were no homes to shelter the immigrant or his family and no work whereby he could earn money to support them. The 3 per cent law was enacted for the very purpose of restricting immigration, and it has accomplished its purpose. During this fiscal year there will be not to exceed a net increase of at least 50,000 immigrants. They are now coming into this country at the rate of about 2,000 per week, but at the same time emigration is equal to at least that number; so that from now on, by reason of many exhausted quotas, emigration and immigration will be about equal. Many are emigrating from this country because in Europe their money converted into money of their native country will give them greater purchasing power than if they had remained here.

This resolution puts the question squarely up to Congress whether or not they will permit these additional 2,400 persons who are now here under bond to remain. Many of them can not be sent back to their own country because there is no one to receive them.

Congress is to be congratulated on the able work of the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Davis, and the Commissioner General of Immigration, Mr. Husband. They have provided quotas for these alien immigrants from countries that did not exist according to the census of 1910; they have provided quotas for countries whose boundaries have been changed since 1910; they have had a thousand and one obstacles to overcome; and I do not believe there is a man here in Congress who can point out a single instance where under the administration of the 3 per cent law there has been a failure. The purpose of the law has been accomplished. The restrictive law is, in fact, almost prohibition.

Whenever and wherever a man can hang out a card "Employment wanted" and have 10 employers seek his services, and he can take his pick and send nine away, conditions are good for the worker. If labor is scarce, it usually gets what it wants, be it better wages or working conditions. When more workers are needed than this country can supply, a law limiting the immigration into the United States is not as necessary as a strict selective system. Prosperity attracts aliens to this country. They come by the hundreds of thousands without a restrictive law. Because of the abundance of laborers and expansion of new and competitive industries, more goods and products are often manufactured than the public can consume. Money and working capital become tight. Directly following each peak wave of immigration comes a period of depression. Work is not so plentiful. The unskilled is the last to be hired; he is the first to be let go. Mr. Jones, the Director General of the United States Employment Service, advises me that a majority of the American workers are placed in the unskilled class. More than 75 per cent of those immigrants who do come here are also in the unskilled class; so that immigration without restriction does the most harm and injury to the unskilled American workman.

The competition is always between the unskilled laborer of America and the immigrant. It is not a fair competition. The latter are used to lower standards of living and lower wages in Europe. The skilled workers fare better. A good industry does not like to lose its organization of skilled men and they are retained as long as possible.

Whenever the country has many unemployed, immigration recedes; many emigrate to their own country. The number of unskilled diminishes. Then gradually industry gets another start. The employer gets ready, he hangs out a card "Men wanted." Ten men apply for every job. He takes his pick and sends the others away. If immigration had not been restricted or diminished during the period of depression, there would be many more to send away. Conditions are now easier for the employer. Then is the time for restrictive immigration. An American Congress should care for Americans first. If there is not enough work for all, we should see that our countrymen have the first opportunity.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] is opposed to the 3 per cent restrictive measure. He is against the literacy test. On the day the resolution extending the 3 per cent law was before the House he said that only "the vicious, the diseased, and the imbecile should be excluded." He was one of the 36 against the resolution, while 281 Members of the House were in favor of further restricting immigration. The negative votes were almost entirely from New York, Chicago, Cleveland, and other centers of foreign population.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] on the day the resolution was under consideration asked the question in his debate on the resolution: That if it is desirable to restrict immigrants, why should it not be more desirable to prohibit them? In reply, I ask if it is desirable for you to stop eating when you have enough, would you say it is more desirable not to eat at all? Or, I would ask you western Members, if it is desirable to restrict the flow of water on a piece of irrigated land, is it more desirable to cut the supply off altogether from that land?

Economic conditions must balance. Rainfall is necessary to produce crops, but too much rain drowns them out. In the construction of a brick wall, referred to by the gentleman from New York, the skilled laborer—the bricklayer—is first necessary. Next comes the man who carries the bricks, but there is a limit to the number of carriers that can be used. If we have too many carriers, there will soon be a surplus of bricks and the carriers will have to cease work. We do not need more of that which is now abundant—workers—but we do need more of that which is scarce—necessary capital to start the wheels of industry. The more wheat or corn we have the better off is everyone except the farmers. The price goes down. The more houses that are constructed the better it is for everyone except the landlord. Rent is lower. The more manual workers we have the better it is for everyone except the workers. Working conditions or wages may not be so good.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. My colleague is on the Committee on Immigration?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In the House we suspended immigration entirely in the first bill, but that was not accepted by the Senate. It is now 3 per cent of the nationals, as I understand it?

Mr. CABLE. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. If we accept the 2,400 that the bill proposes, what effect will it have on the unemployment situation?

Mr. CABLE. As I see it, it will have but little effect, because emigration from this country now equals immigration to it. Those 2,400 consist chiefly of women and children, who will not compete with the workers of America.

Mr. FESS. Emigration is now equal to immigration?

Mr. CABLE. That is my understanding. There are now coming into this country about 2,000 per week, and at the same time, in the months of January and February of this year, close to 8,000 emigrated from this country.

Mr. FESS. What is the purpose of their returning in such numbers? That is an interesting matter to me.

Mr. CABLE. I will try to explain that, and I will refer again to the statement of the gentleman from New York in his discussion on extending the 3 per cent immigration law. He contends that we never emerge from a period of depression except under the influence of increased immigration. On the contrary, a flood of immigration always directly precedes a period of depression. The flood recedes during depression. Only when business activity reaches normal does immigration again increase. Increased immigration is one of the causes of bad times. History tells us that we always emerge from a period of depression by the aid of American workers only; then when times get better the immigrant is attracted by the good wages in this country and he returns to America. He is with us in times of prosperity, but always absent in periods of depression.

If you will take the year 1882 as an example, the tide of immigration reached its high point up to that time—almost 800,000. Overproduction, inability to consume, capital tied up, money tight, directly followed. At the end of that year, with the huge number of immigrants, came a period of depression. The low point of the depression occurred in 1885, when prosperity and business began to increase; business went back to normal by July, 1886. Let us see what part immigration played in bringing the country out of a depression and back to normal. Figures of the Department of Labor show us that immigration did not increase until 1887—that is, probably a year after the country was back to normal and only when wages were good did they start to come back here in any large numbers.

Or, again, take the depression of 1907. There is always a cycle of immigration the same as there is a cycle of depression, and one fits into the other. In 1907 occurred the high mark of immigration to this country, over 1,285,000. Another depression immediately followed. Then came a slump in immigration as a result of the depression. Immigration fell off, but in the meantime business began to pick up in the summer of 1908, and was back to normal in the summer of 1909. If immigration had anything to do with pulling America out of a depression, as the gentleman from New York contends, it must be shown that the immigrants came here in times of depression in large numbers, but the fact is not so. The official records show that it is not until business hits normal and there is a return to prosperity that there is always a return of the immigrants.

A more striking example is the depression of 1914. In 1913 and 1914 more than 2,400,000 immigrants came. If these people create work, as the gentleman from New York contends, why then in 1914 did we have such a depression instead of prosperity? Why was it that business returned to normal in 1915 while the gentleman's increase of immigration necessary for the return of prosperity was entirely absent? In fact, there was a decrease of immigrants of almost 900,000 less than the year previous.

We should not put the alien and his interest first. To hold that his presence here in large numbers is necessary for prosperity is contrary to history itself. Let us act humanely, justly, and fairly to both the would-be immigrants and to the Americans, but America should first be for the Americans.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, this resolution proposes to admit into the United States some 2,443 immigrants from the various nations of Europe in excess of those who would be admitted under the 3 per cent quota law. The 3 per cent quota law is the most restrictive measure we have ever had upon our statute books with respect to immigration. After the House passed the first bill suspending immigration it went to the Senate, and this bill was written in its stead as being the only restrictive measure possible to get through the Congress. I supported it. Later, when the resolution came in to admit something over 1,000 immigrants who were to be admitted over the quotas of the various nations, I supported that resolution, broke with my colleagues on the committee in order to do so, because that did not increase the number of immigrants coming from any country and because there was some confusion in the early stages of the working out of the immigration act. Now, this resolution comes up on a different basis. The restrictive act has been in operation for quite a long period. The authorities have had every opportunity to work out its details and the nations of Europe have had every opportunity to know what the quotas were, because they have been published and sent over, and the steamship companies, who have persisted in violating every immigration law that has ever been on the statute books of this country, not only knew about it, and yet they have taken advantage of what they thought would be a failure of those charged with the enforcement of this act in America to live up to the law, and so the immigrants have continued to come in excess of the quotas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. What is the reason for this exception?

Mr. WILSON. From my standpoint there is no reason why we should make any exception, and the only reason that has been given is that just stated in the majority report and that just stated in the very interesting speech of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE]. The majority report gives as the reason that it would be an act of grace on the part of the United States; that is what the report says. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE], after quoting a few lines of poetry, stated it would be an act of mercy to admit those people. Gentlemen, if you are going to vote for this resolution at all that would be the reason that you follow—that there are 2,443 people from various nations of Europe who have been permitted to land here in violation of the statute whom they are going to ask to admit, and we say we will admit them as a matter of grace, or, in the language of Mr. VAILE, as a matter of mercy.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am wondering what the gentleman would do with some of these, particularly infants, who have been mentioned by the chairman of the Committee on Immigration?

Mr. WILSON. What would I do with them? Do what we ought to do and say to them, as to everybody, that here is a statute, a solemn act of Congress, that ought to be obeyed and ought to be enforced. No one knows who these people are——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What are you going to do with the baby of this woman from——

Mr. WILSON. There is no evidence before the committee or the House that there are babies, or who these 2,443 people are. Now, that is the sentimental side of this question, and that happens to be a situation that becomes very interesting just at this time.

I do not know any better way to answer the argument for this resolution, the argument of grace or the argument of mercy, than to read you a few extracts from a very interesting editorial appearing in the Saturday Evening Post of March 4. It seems, whether we are dealing with immigration or any other question, that there is a disposition in this country to concede everything to the Europeans, whether it be a question of financial consideration, of immigration, or treaties, or anything else. A very interesting question came up some time ago when we were asked to pay something over $100,000,000 to Great Britain. The question was raised that Great Britain owed us more than that amount of interest on the loan to that country. This was a question of expense for the transportation of our troops that fought in battles of the late war. We paid over the cash to Britain and were not even given permission to give credit for $168,000,000 against the interest due us of $400,000,000. So that is something of the same sentiment and conditions that prevail here by which we are asked continually, after months of trial, to relax our law on immigration.

This editorial is entitled "America Last." I will read a few extracts from it. It says:

> The mob mind, without which there can be no war, has reached its fullest development in Europe; but the mush mind is peculiar to America. Every other nation, both in its foreign and in its domestic affairs, has its eye on its number all the time, and that number is invariably number one.

The writer goes on to discuss this question of picking up every European habit and yielding to European sentiment, and states, for reasons he does not give and which I do not know, that there is beginning to be a departure from that custom in America; that we are beginning to get away from that. And he goes on, after saying that, with this very interesting and encouraging observation, speaking of this yielding to other nations and the relaxing of our laws, giving up our money without contention, joining in any kind of an agreement so as to protect the rest of the world, without regard to America:

> All this is not native to America. There is a dash of Puritanism in the American character, and even at its broadest and roughest a saving remnant of decency that instinctively revolts against this lowering of our old standards.

Further—

> Wherever we turn our immigration problem confronts us, and we see the results of our policy of putting the alien and his interests first and America last. For we have done just that. We have babbled in our political platforms of the full dinner pail and the necessity for tariffs to keep it full, and then we have let down the bars to the cheap labor of every European country so that the dinner pail may not be too full. To justify the claims made by its proponents a high tariff must go hand in hand with high immigration bars or we shall have dear goods and cheap men.

Now, after that the author goes on to discuss this proposition of bringing over hordes of immigrants and putting them on American farms in order to settle up the waste places of the country—to bring them here to compete with the American farmer—and states that that is the propaganda of those who believe in unlimited immigration. Everybody who is informed on the question knows that as conditions are now it is the easiest thing in the world to produce a surplus of agricultural products, and yet the contention is to bring over immigration to reclaim land and settle up the waste places of the earth and thereby compete with the American farmer. He gives a very interesting observation, that when you have an overproduction in the steel mills production is cut down. The same is true of every other industry. But when you have it on the farm you come and ask for unlimited immigration to increase production by cheap labor with which the American farmer can not compete and maintain his standard of living.

And then later on he says:

If you will make an understanding survey of New York or Chicago or Pittsburgh, cities where the immigration problem is more apparent at a glance than in other places, though it is everywhere, you will see for yourself what is happening to America.

With it all we have not solved or even helped a single one of Europe's problems, but we have half ruined America. Yet our sentimentalists babble on of our "traditional policy" and demand that we shall "offer refuge to the poor and oppressed of Europe." There are tears for alien children, sobs for alien uncles, convulsive weeping over alien cousins, but few to consider what this bogus generosity, this asinine sentimentality has done to Americans. Must they always be last, thrown out of their jobs, run off their land, shouldered aside in their own country to make room for this plague of pushing immigrants? Must we try to solve everybody's problems except our own, and to work out everybody's salvation except our own? Or shall we go back a ways to saner and cleaner standards and strive to make this a country worth living in?

And further:

As this is written Congress is greatly concerned over the tariff and the American valuation plan. It is trying to prevent dumping of cheap foreign goods. That is important. But it is the dumping of cheap foreign men that is of first importance to us—American values, not American valuation—that should first engage our attention.

And here is something of the first importance here:

Those who want immigration—more of it, lots of it—are active. They supply mush freely, but they do not use it themselves. Their feet are on the ground and their heads are busy with the future of their races. Only the American has been so concerned with his little affairs that he has had no time to bother with larger problems—so engrossed with to-day's petty business and pleasures that he has had no time for the future of America and of his children.

Now, Mr. Chairman, nothing truer was ever said than that the proponents of unlimited, unrestricted mass organization are always busy in this country. With this 3 per cent immigration restriction, which I rather predict will be on the statute books for a number of years, not over 350,000 would come annually. Yet this resolution is proposing to admit those who have come, in violation of the law, after the quotas from their countries had been exhausted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. And would it not encourage the very same thing in the future?

Mr. WILSON. That is what I am trying to impress upon the Members of the House. The disposition here to relax our laws, relax our customs, sacrifice our principles, for European people and European causes has become a dangerous practice in this country, and the only way we can get away from it is to stand by the laws we pass—see that they are enforced not only in this country but as against those from other countries.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am in general hearty accord with the gentleman, as he knows, and in accord with what he has stated to be the purpose of the bill—in other words, to permit the 350,000 aliens to come here in a fiscal year. If we pass this resolution admitting 2,400, does that mean an excess of the 350,000 in the year?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; that will be in excess of the quota for the countries from which they come.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. These are in excess of the 3 per cent quota list?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I want to be sure that it is in excess over the year's quota.

Mr. WILSON. The report says that. It says that if they come in at all we do not permit it for any reason except as an act of grace on the part of the United States.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It is not an act of grace or mercy if there is no excess of quota above the amount we allowed of 350,000 from all countries.

Mr. WILSON. I stick to my statement, that these are landed here and admitted, and if the quotas from those countries are exhausted——

Mr. VAILE. From those countries?

Mr. WILSON. Those countries; yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am talking about the quotas.

Mr. WILSON. I say the quotas from those countries, and it involves the same principle exactly. Who are these people that are seeking to come in here?

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON. I first want to explain to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. These are here in excess of the quotas allowed from their countries. Who are they about whom all these tears are being shed, and about whom all this talk is being made about grace and mercy on the part of the United States? Read the report. Three hundred and forty-three Turks we are asked here to shed tears about and relax our laws for; also some 70 Africans.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I was in accord with the gentleman, and I believe that we could perhaps assimilate 350,000 a year. Now, if we admit these 2,400, that does not mean that we admit those in excess of the 350,000?

Mr. WILSON. These are here in excess of the quotas of those countries.

Mr. VAILE. But the gentleman knows that immigration now has diminished to less than 900 a week.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know what it will be for the rest of the year. That is uncertain. Here are 379 from Hungary that the gentleman is here quoting his mournful poetry about, for whose benefit we shall pull down our statutes and waive our right to enforce the law and tell those people who are here unlawfully on our soil, "You can stay."

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Where are these people?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know where they are. They are here under bond. They have been admitted temporarily, and unless this law is passed I suppose they will be subject to deportation.

Mr. BROOKS. They are scattered all over the United States and it will be impossible to find them.

Mr. WILSON. That would be a fine excuse for the violation of the law—to say we have admitted them and they are now scattered all over the country and we can not find them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is a reflection on our action in allowing them to come in, is it not?

Mr. WILSON. Exactly.

Mr. LONDON. They are all under bond. They must appear when summoned.

Mr. WILSON. Yes; but they are not likely to be summoned. Now, as previously stated, the record does not show anything as to the class or condition of the people constituting the 2,443 aliens sought to be admitted by this resolution. If there are unfortunate and distressing cases of women and children, why not deal with those alone and independently? Then your appeal for sympathy might be entitled to consideration.

Mr. Chairman, when I appeal here for the proper consideration of America; American customs, ideals, and institutions; and respect for and obedience to our Constitution and the statutes we solemnly enact, I have in mind as part of this Nation our immigrant citizens as well as the native born. Those who have come here and assumed the responsibilities of American citizenship and have become a part of the social, commercial, and industrial life of our country are entitled to equal protection of its laws and the full enjoyment of all its privileges. I stand for that. But in the interest of all and for the good of all we must adhere to the policy of restricted immigration, whatever the results may be to foreign countries or their inhabitants. This question is beyond the field of politics, and about which there should be no room for division and partisanship.

There are to-day 700,000 veterans of the late war out of employment and in distress. There are 5,000,000 American citizens without work. Upon these many American women and children are dependent for their daily bread and sustenance. Should these not be first in our sympathy? And are they not entitled to our first consideration? Actuated by the belief and conviction that these Americans should come first, I believe that in the proper discharge of our obligations to our country we should oppose the passage of this resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROSSDALE] four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, the question under discussion here to-day is not that of immigration restriction. The only issue involved in this resolution before the House is the question of the resolution itself to make permanent the right of admittance of the 2,443 immigrants whom the immigration authorities for humanitarian reasons had temporarily permitted to enter the United States under bond in excess of the quota limit. This resolution is to remedy some of the defects of the 3 per cent immigration restriction act of last year and lessen some of the inequalities, injustices, and unusual hardships entailed to these immigrants in the administration of that law.

It is not an attempt to break down or nullify the present 3 per cent restriction act, because all of the 2,443 cases mentioned are unusual cases, resulting from the enactment of a law that suddenly changed the accepted and traditional policy of the United States from a haven and a refuge to all of the oppressed peoples of the world to a land of very limited entry, bordering on close restriction.

The administration of this new law, so different from the old law, very naturally brought about such complications which any new law brings about, for it is inevitable when a new law is passed, especially a radically changed law, such as the 3 per cent quota act, that many inequalities would exist and that it would entail many injustices, and it is to correct these things that this resolution is presented here to-day.

Now, how unfair and unjust and how cruel some of these things may be is known only by the victims themselves, their relatives, the immigration authorities, and those Members of Congress who have interested themselves in the fate of these unfortunate people.

I want to bring before the House the case of a mother and a daughter who, if this resolution is not passed, will be subject to deportation. They are admitted under bond at present. It is the case of a poor Polish woman and her daughter. The mother had a son living in my congressional district. The boy enlisted in Company D of the Three hundred and twenty-eighth United States Infantry. He was a runner, a dangerous assignment as you know, and he was killed in action in France. Some time in the month of December my home paper, the Bronx Home News, called my attention to this case, and I went down to Ellis Island and saw this old lady and her daughter, and through an interpreter I got her story. She handed me this telegram. It had been forwarded to her in Poland by another son, who is also a citizen of the United States, and it was from The Adjutant General of the United States Army. I am going to read it to you. I read:

MEYER GOSTIN,
1037 Bryant Avenue, New York:

Deeply regret to inform you that Pvt. Harry Gostin, of Three hundred and twenty-eighth Infantry, is officially reported as killed in action between October 8 and October 15.

(Signed) HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

The record there is wrong. The name is Gostinska. The mother's name is Rela Gostinska and her daughter Perl Gostinska.

No one will deny that this poor woman and her daughter have a just claim to enter the United States. This mother gave all that any mother can give to our country. She gave it her boy. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is unthinkable to insist upon deportation and send this boy's mother and sister back to Poland. I do not think harsh action in such a case would meet with the wishes of the American people, for deportation is generally a tragedy since they have nowhere to go, once they leave their homes in their native land. We owe a great debt to some of these soldier boys. Among that 2,443 aliens are numerous blood relatives of foreign-born American soldiers. I could bring a number of such cases before this House had I the time.

I have here a poster or billboard that was posted in 1917 and 1918 in my district and elsewhere throughout the country, and on it in blood-red letters are the words "Americans all." "Enlist." It mentions all of these names: Du Bois, Smith, O'Brien, Cejka, Haucke, Turovich, Kowalski, Pappandrikopolous, Andrassi, Villotto, Levy, Chriczanevicz, Knutson, Gonzales. I find here two Polish names. I can understand why Harry Gostinska enlisted and fought and died for this country, but I can not understand why gentlemen will stand up in this House and deny to this woman, this mother of an American hero, an asylum here. [Applause.]

The case I have cited is of two of these 2,443 immigrants who face deportation unless this resolution is passed. I could recite the heart-rending stories of a number of the others, for their cases have been called to my attention by their relatives, and I have aided in bringing their appeals before the department whenever the extenuating circumstances warranted it. Each of these cases is gripping in its human-interest story and tells of sufferings and hardships almost beyond belief. This resolution affects 2,443 immigrants, very few of whom have a place to go if we were to deport them.

I have stressed the case of the mother and sister of an enlisted foreign-born soldier, who gave his life for his adopted country, and which country now challenges the right of his mother and sister to enter that land of adoption, because, unfortunately for them and for all the others who have no ex-soldier relatives here, a certain stipulated number of persons—we call it a quota—preceded them here by possibly a number of weeks or days.

The 3 per cent immigration restriction act of last year made no exception and gave no preference to the blood relatives of our foreign-born soldiers who served this country in the late World War, and among these 2,443 immigrants are many parents, brothers, and sisters and fiancés of foreign-born American soldiers. It is too late now for us to discuss the merits or demerits of that act, for it is the law; but we can at least remedy some of its defects, and I believe no quota restriction should prevent the father, mother, sister or brother, or fiancé of any honorably discharged American soldier from coming to our shores.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman fom New York has expired.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a few minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Under the provisions of the act of last year the total number of immigrants eligible to enter the United States from everywhere in the world was about 300,000. Of this total quota from all countries, 198,000 have been admitted to date. From a number of countries the quotas were filled in a five-month period and some shortly thereafter. From the countries with large quotas only a portion of those eligible came; hence it is that the countries with the smaller quotas were soon filled, and there came a surplus. It could not be avoided, for we had no way of properly allotting the consular visés to check it. About 1,700 were actually deported because of excess of quotas; an additional 2,443 cases were of such unusual circumstances that they were permitted to enter temporarily under bond, and I am certain this small number of persons added to our population will not alter the industrial, political, or economic conditions of the United States, and we ought to permit them to enter, and I hope this resolution will be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 17 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. RAKER. And I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California yields two minutes, making seven minutes in all.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, if the House had given any consideration originally to the law, and had given a little more time so as to make it possible for those who were already on their way to enter our ports, this resolution would not be necessary. But unfortunately the majority of the 2,400 immigrants in question were on their way before the 3 per cent law went into effect.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman means that they were either on their way or that they had visés on their passports.

Mr. SABATH. Or that they were in different ports. I do not mean that they were already on shipboard.

Now, in some way or other gentlemen are under the impression that this amendment to the law will let in a great number of people, and even the chairman tells how many will arrive. Do gentlemen know that during the period in which the 3 per cent law has been in effect, and I quote from statistics which were just handed to me, that since July 1, 1921, only 226,661 immigrants were admitted and that 251,461 departed, or 27,600 more immigrants departed than arrived; and I venture to say that when the fiscal year is over we will not have admitted more than 275,000, most of whom are the wives, children, and parents of American citizens and declarants, and that at least 350,000 will have departed from the United States?

And still there is great hue and cry about the 2,400 people who have been admitted, a majority of whom are the wives, mothers, and fathers of American citizens and declarants who have done a great deal for the country during the war. I am amazed that there are some people who are ready and willing to say that these mothers and fathers, these wives, and these little children should be taken from here and sent back where they have no one to take care of them. I think it would be not only unjust but the most inhumane act of which this House could be guilty to send them back. I appeal to the membership on this side not to be carried away by prejudice, but to demonstrate that we are big enough, that we possess hearts, that we do sympathize with unfortunate people, especially women and children, and that the membership of this House will say to them, "You are here; you have been admitted; you are not taking any jobs from anyone else; you are being taken care of; you are living with your friends and relatives; and here you may remain." The majority of these people do not deprive anyone else of a job.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I can not yield. I am sorry I can not; I have not the time. The unemployment in this country last year was not due to immigration. It was due to other causes. Do not blame it on immigration, because since 1915 we really have had no increase in immigration. So do not charge it to that. If you think these people are undesirable, I wish you would come out into the interior of the country and see what good citizens they are getting to be, instead of reading prejudiced articles that have been paid for and instigated by narrow-minded, prejudiced men. Come out to Chicago and I will show you some of these people. I had the case of a mother and two daughters for whom I appealed. A mother lost her two boys fighting for the cause of the Allies. These daughters have been admitted temporarily, and they have been here seven or eight months. In that time they have saved $450. They will not become a public charge. They have already deposited $300 on a little home which they have purchased and in which they now live. By refusing to vote favorably for this resolution you say to that happy mother and two daughters, notwithstanding that she gave to the cause her only two sons, that they must be taken into custody and deported to a country where nothing but starvation awaits them.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON], who preceded me, has read from an article from the Saturday Evening Post, wherein the writer points out the great dangers our Nation faces because of our broad and liberal immigration policies in the past. To him and all others who are engaged, as well as those who employ them to write these articles, I will say that the actual facts completely belie their charges and assertions. If they were desirous of giving the actual truth as to the effect that immigration had upon our Nation, they would be obliged to say that the real increase in immigration commenced in 1880, and since that time the country has increased its wealth from $43,000,000,000 to $290,000,000,000 in 1921; our exports have increased from $835,000,000 in 1880 to $6,516,000,000 in 1921; in 1880 money in circulation amounted to $973,382,228, while in 1921 it reached the sum of $5,774,065,654; in 1880 bank clearings totaled $84,000,000,000 and the amount reached in 1921 was $462,920,000,000; deposits in savings banks in 1880 was $819,000,000; in 1921 they were $6,018,000,000; the number of depositors in 1880 numbered 2,335,582; in 1921 they numbered 10,737,843. The value of farms and farm property in 1880 was $12,180,501,508; in 1921 the value was $40,991,449,090; farm products value in 1880 were $2,212,000,000 as compared to $8,498,000,000 in 1921; the farm animal value in 1880 was $1,576,000,000; in 1921, $6,235,000,000. Cattle horses, and swine actually doubled since 1880. In 1880 we exported $835,000,000 worth of merchandise, and in 1921, $6,516,000,000; in 1880 the value of our mine and quarry products amounted to $367,000,000; in 1920, $6,707,000,000. In 1899 we built vessels amounting to 300,000 tons; in 1920, 3,880,629,000; and in 1921, 2,665,000,000 tons; in 1920 we had 12,601,935 telephones in the United States.

In 1880 we had 8,955,000 dwellings and in 1920, 20,697,000, and notwithstanding that within the last 10 to 15 years we have constructed thousands of up-to-date, tremendous apartment buildings, in 1920 there was only 5.1 per cent persons to a dwelling as against 5.6 in 1880, clearly showing that more people own their homes and live better. In 1880 the average daily school attendance was 6,144,000; in 1918 it was 15,548,000. The university attendance for 1880 was 286,000 students and in 1918 it had increased to 650,000. For common-school education the sum of $78,000,000 was expended in 1880; in 1918, $763,000,000. The number of collegiate resident graduate students in universities, colleges, and technical schools in 1880 was 68,256; in 1918 they numbered 375,000.

There is no one who has the courage or nerve to say, notwithstanding the immigration for the last 40 years, that America and the American citizen has not progressed, not only in wealth but in education and knowledge, so that he is head and shoulders above any other people on the face of the globe. It must be admitted by all and everyone that the five millions of boys who formed our Army, Navy, and Marine Corps in the late war, beyond any doubt, surpassed men that composed the armies of any other nation, not only in vigor, loyalty, courage, and bravery, but physically, mentally, and intellectually, and that notwithstanding the fact that nearly 50 per cent of them were the boys of immigrants or immigrants themselves.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the article which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] read must have been written by the same individual who just completed a book which has just reached me, and undoubtedly sent to every other Member for the purpose of prejudicing them on this question. This book, to my mind, contains more unjustifiable, unwarranted charges, and more libel than any other "thing" ever written by anyone who had the courage (?) to publish it under his own name.

Mr. Chairman, during the war immigrants demonstrated beyond any doubt that they were loyal and patriotic and ready to give even their lives for this country of ours. Why should we not be fair and liberal and humane to these few people who will not affect anyone. I venture to say that not one of these 2,400 people live in the districts of the gentlemen who are opposed to this joint resolution. Still, these gentlemen take great pains to oppose this humane measure that has been brought in by the chairman of this committee. I congratulate the chairman [Mr. JOHNSON of Washington] upon his action, and I congratulate the majority of the committee, and I hope that when you gentlemen vote you will not be carried away by the remarks and statements that have been printed in some of the papers, statements which are not true, written by people who do not know anything about conditions or who willfully and deliberately falsify. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, during the last fiscal year nearly 1,000,000 immigrants were permitted to enter our country. Thousands upon thousands of others would have come over if it had not been for the restrictions of the visé law. This Congress felt that for the present at least immigration to the extent of 1,000,000 per year was far too much, and passed the 3 per cent law which provided for a maximum of 355,000, providing every country filled its quota. Up to the present time about 200,000 have been admitted, and as many countries have already exhausted their quotas, probably not to exceed 250,000 will enter this fiscal year. This 3 per cent law was not a substitute for existing restrictive laws but an addition. It was a further restriction. It said in effect that regardless of qualifications under existing law not more than the 3 per cent shall enter.

It was a distinct departure from existing law. It was passed as an emergency measure, and was placed in operation without adequate time to work out proper methods for administering it. Quotas had to be established for each country. European boundaries have been changing, making it difficult to apply quotas to individual cases. But with all its faults and difficulties it has one real virtue. It restricts, and that is what this country needs.

Some of these quotas were necessarily small and were exhausted almost immediately following the passage of the act.

It appears that in one way or another 2,443 persons have been admitted by the Immigration Service who are in excess of the quota. The list is as follows:

EXCESS OF QUOTAS.

A table showing the excess of quotas by countries from July 1, 1921, to February 28, 1922, follows:

Number of persons admitted in excess of quotas to Feb. 28, 1922, during eight months of operation of 3 per cent act.

Belgium	5
Greece	152
Hungary	379
Yugoslavia	228
Poland (including eastern Galicia)	251
Portugal (including Azores and Madeira Islands)	78
Spain	97
Other European (including Andorra, Gibraltar, Lichtenstein, Malta, Memel, Monaco, San Marino, and Iceland)	25
Palestine	151
Syria	87
Turkey (Europe and Asia, including Smyrna district)	431
Other Asia (including Persia, Rhodes, Cyprus, and territory other than Siberia, which is not included in the Asiatic barred zone; persons born in Siberia are included in the Russia quota)	444
Africa	63
Australia	7
New Zealand	24
Atlantic Islands (other than Azores, Madeira, and islands adjacent to the American continents)	21
Total	2,443

These people are not defectives. All are admissible under our immigration laws. All have a visé from an American consul. They have not been admitted because they come from countries whose quota has been exhausted.

How did they happen to come? Why did they leave their own country before learning whether they would be permitted to enter here?

Among this number are orphan children whose friends were assured by the Government that the quota was not exhausted and who then cabled for the children to come. Upon arrival here the quota was found to be exhausted.

Others of these people left their homes in far-away parts of Asia before we passed this law. The journey here has cost them thousands of dollars.

There is a group of people from Assyria, who fought against the Turks in Mesopotamia and who, after untold hardships, finally reached civilization. Throughout their overland march of hundreds of miles they carried at the head of their column the Stars and Stripes. American consular officers furnished them with visés. This was long before the 3 per cent law was enacted. The quota from Assyria was small, and when they arrived at our Pacific port the quota had been exhausted.

What shall we do with them? We can not send them back to Assyria. They have no way of getting there. Furthermore, the Turk would be there to exterminate those who arrived.

In this group of 2,400 are 200 Armenian refugee children. They were gathered together by American citizens, who brought them here in good faith, with no knowledge of the fact that coming from the Armenians of Turkey they were properly chargeable to Turkey, whose quota was exhausted.

You who are opposing this law, what do you advise doing with them? American citizens in the best of faith brought them here after they had rescued them from the Turk. Shall we turn them back? You who oppose this law must either answer in the affirmative or propose another remedy.

The hearings before the committee show that the Turks massacred one group that were denied visés because the quota had been exhausted. Three American citizens were among those slain.

Surely we can not turn these people back under such circumstances. American citizens in good faith have brought them here, and I am not willing to lend my aid to their deportation to certain death.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am sorry, but I can not yield.

Mr. Chairman, there is but a choice between admission or deportation.

It is the business of the State Department to establish a proper liaison between its visé officers and the Immigration Service so as to prevent issuance of visés where quotas are exhausted or nearly exhausted.

The Immigration Service should not permit quotas to be exhausted, but should keep a sort of reserve list for cases of great emergencies.

The steamship companies should be required to observe even more care in selling passage to citizens of countries whose quota is nearly exhausted.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that this is being done, or is being worked out. In my judgment there should be no occasion for any similar request for the next year if there is this cooperation between State Department, Immigration Bureau, and steamship companies. Mr. Chairman, this bill in the interests of humanity and for the good name of America should pass. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I will occupy the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 20 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I request, for the first time I have ever done it, that I may be permitted to conclude my remarks without interruption.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for one general question?

Mr. RAKER. For one question.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It does not pertain directly to this measure. At least three years ago the promise was held out that a permanent law would be enacted fixing a definite immigration policy. When the bill was brought in that was passed about a year ago that promise was renewed. Nevertheless since that bill was enacted there has been another merely temporary extension measure passed by the House. Can the gentleman tell us—and I know if he can he will do it very frankly—why it is that the committee has failed to evolve permanent legislation dealing with the immigration problem, which is admitted to be of prime importance, and with all its features, and including the matter of examining immigrants on the other side of the ocean, so as to avoid having those who are disqualified from being landed in this country?

Mr. RAKER. I wish I could do so now, but I will get to that before I get through. Now, gentlemen, I shall be frank and as near to the point as I can on what I am going to say. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], on the 2d of March, made a speech on what had been accomplished in the present administration, and included in that as one great constructive piece of legislation the act of May 19, 1921. Now, that act provides that when the 3 per cent has been exhausted no more can be admitted. It is not a provision that allows any discretion in the Secretary of Labor; it is a plain mandatory provision:

> When the maximum number of aliens of any particular nationality who may be admitted in any fiscal year under this act shall have been admitted, all other aliens of such nationality, except as otherwise provided in the act, who may apply for admission during the same fiscal year shall be excluded.

There is no discretion. The question of mercy is not involved in this case. The minority would go as far as anyone if it was.

Now, gentlemen I want to say to you that there was not a word of hearings or testimony had on this resolution. There was nothing before the committee in regard to these 2,400—who they are, where they came from, what is their nationality—except a written statement left with the chairman of the committee, which I hold in my hand, and which is referred to and made a part of this report. There is nothing to show when they left their own country, and I say without successful contradiction that the chairman of this committee made a statement to this House when the matter was up on June 20, 1921, when we allowed the 11,000 during that time to come in under the resolution, that "that would clear the seas." Turn, gentlemen, to the RECORD, page 2778, and you will see that he said that would clear the seas of all the men that had started entitled to enter, and they allowed the 11,000 to enter.

Mr. BOX. And were not a lot of them landed in advance while that was being considered?

Mr. RAKER. That is true. The order made does not show any question of hardship. I want to impress on your mind, if I can, that when we made a request that the committee have hearings to show where these people came from, when they left, and how they were admitted, and whether there was any question of mercy or sympathy, it was defeated and turned down and the committee of this House was denied an opportunity to be heard. All these statements about sympathy, all these statements about mercy, are not involved in this case, because there is not a word of testimony before the committee on any such basis.

Let me tell you what is the matter. The Immigration Service, by virtue of the enormous pressure that is being brought to bear by certain Members high in official authority, many groups of people interested because they want the work, many people who desire to bring them here, organizations, have been doing everything in their power to break down this law and get their people in. I believe that we would have been able to show if we had gone into testimony in the hearings that some of these men had been sent for and notified four or five months before they came over believing they would be entitled to be admitted. They have broken down the Immigration Service at Ellis Island ruthlessly, improperly, and I just want to call your attention without reading any names, as I think it ought to be, what was done:

> Report that certain officials under Immigration Service at Ellis Island and New York have been charged with criminal violation of the law in regard to admitting immigrants. How many and what is the situation? Kindly advise me. I want it as a member of the Committee on Immigration of the House.

That was the only chance I had to get any information. What do I get?

March 13, 1922—this is from a public official, who has charge and knows:

> The matter about which you have telegraphed me is in the hands of the district attorney. I can not, therefore, divulge any names at the present time.

Money being used; desire to bring these people in against the law; desire to break the law down? Gentlemen, there was never such a saturnalia of effort to break down a law as there is at this time, and we would have been able to demonstrate it if we had had the hearings. I am not going to criticize my colleagues, but I think they were mistaken. They are overburdened with telegrams to break down the law and put people in. That is the trouble.

Now, in addition to that, here is the crux of the situation, and I want you to think about this: There are 2,400 and over who are here. Nobody knows whether they are men, women, or children; nobody knows whether they are all laboring men; nobody knows——

Mr. ROSSDALE. The department knows.

Mr. RAKER. We do not get the information. Their agents are charged with a criminal offense in letting them in.

Mr. ROSSDALE. They are not admissible under this act.

Mr. RAKER. Twenty-four hundred. Let us see what that means to the steamship companies. According to my colleague and lovable chairman, when he made his speech, which I have before me, on June 20, 1921, that bill cleared the seas. That is what he said, and it did. We extended it four or five days. None of these people that are admitted started without knowledge, and everybody knows it. This notice is given every week to the steamship companies and to everyone else. The steamship companies, under the law, must pay the expense of keeping these people; they must pay the expense of gathering them up. They must pay the expense of returning it, and they have been active, energetic, persistent, domineering, and have almost tried to override the Congress. They have appealed to the President; they have gone to the Secretary of Labor; they have gone to the Commissioner General of Immigration. They have done everything on earth they could in every way in New York. This bill alone means to them in the neighborhood of $500,000, from the payment of which they will be relieved, if the bill is passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that these persons who have been admitted under bond, if they are returned, are returned at the expense of the steamship companies?

Mr. RAKER. Yes..

Mr. MANN. That statement is directly opposite to one made to me by the Immigration Service.

Mr. RAKER. It could not be.

Mr. MANN. It was so made.

Mr. RAKER. What I mean is this: It could not be the law, because the law says that they can not be admitted. There is no provision that gives the Secretary of Labor or the Commissioner General of Immigration the right to admit these people. Therefore he has allowed them to enter temporarily, with an understanding, and the order is made now for deportation in every case, because they are here contrary to law, and the steamship companies must pay their expense while at Ellis Island and must assist in gathering them up and must return them, and it will amount to in the neighborhood of $500,000, and the steamship companies are personally involved here. They are the ones for whom we are shedding tears and not for any pretended or assumed orphans. To make my answer plain to the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think the gentleman makes the answer plain, but it is contrary to what the Immigration Service told me was the case.

Mr. RAKER. I say this, and I stand by it, and there is no getting away from it. If they had not been admitted, if they are admitted temporarily, legally, the steamship company is responsible, and if the Secretary of Labor has admitted them illegally, then the question of whether the steamship companies would be compelled to return these people and pay their expenses is doubtful.

Mr. MANN. It is easy to split hairs about the theory, but the fact is another thing. The fact is that the steamship companies do not return them at their expense.

Mr. RAKER. It is a dead, open, moral certainty that if they had been detained as directed by law, had been kept at Ellis Island, the steamship companies under the law would have been compelled to return them at the expense of the steamship companies.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. RAKER. There is no doubt about that. It is only a question of the violation of the law.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield. Except for a voluntary, ex parte statement, there is not a word before you upon which you can base your judgment or sympathy upon the question of even humanity, if you please. The committee were denied that right. We were unable to get that testimony to bring it before you, and there is brought in here the bold statement, and they rely on hearsay or outside testimony in regard to this matter, and they are now appealing to you on the question of sympathy to break down the Immigration Service to permit these people to come in here contrary to law, to the end and for the reason that many people or a number in these large cities are interested and always have been against the immigration law in the first place, and in the second place as a finality and as a fact the steamship companies are the people involved, and they are the ones who want this law repealed if they can get it repealed. They are the ones who are the strong sponsors for the particular legislation to allow these people in here. Talk about sympathy, talk about mercy, talk about humanity! Then my friend from New York comes in here with a folder that he has had rolled up for three or four years, with nothing to show who these people are. We could have gotten at the testimony and have presented it to the House if we had had the opportunity. We would have been able to show how the Immigration Service at Ellis Island is being broken down, when it has been suggested on the outside that some men went in and rubbed at least 20 names off the manifest, and then had gotten $100 apiece for these men that were over the quota. This is thus reported. The facts should have been adduced. We could have proven those facts I am convinced, but we were denied the opportunity, and you are denied it. The Secretary of Labor, the Commissioner General of Immigration, each in his heart and in his mind wants to enforce the law. They told us that they are in favor of it, but there is a constant appeal and demand that they do not enforce it. We should uphold them in enforcing the law.

Then they promised him they would possibly get this piece of legislation through in this body if he would let them in temporarily, and then he told them that these people ought to be deported. That they were here illegally, and this Congress breaks the law down. That was his statement to the committee some time before on another matter. If we are going to enforce the law, it is up to you, it is up to the people. Now, what are you going to do about it? We said, enforce the law, of course; there is nothing else to do. You break it down in this instance; break it down in matters that are somewhat important; and every steamship company gets notice every week, and everybody knows the quota, full information has been given to these people, and notwithstanding that they said that they secured the passage of one resolution leaving in over 11,000 who were illegally here at that time, and we will run the risk, we can even send over for our friends, our relatives, or anyone we want, because we know by the time they get here they will be held at Ellis Island for a week or two or maybe 10 days, great complaint will come up on the ground of sympathy; we will give no facts; we will submit no testimony to be presented; and the House will have no opportunity to know the facts, and we will make a grandstand play on the ground of mercy and humanity, and we will get the resolution through, notwithstanding the appeal of my distinguished colleague from Ohio, who got up here the other day and said that this was one of the great pieces of legislation enacted by the present administration, that he believed in the enforcement of the law, that if we passed a law and if we find men violating the law we ought to punish them, and that we ought to stand by the law, we ought to stand for the enforcing of the law. Here you come, because there are a lot of appeals, because there is organization, as Judge Box said, because he watched them; the steamship companies stayed up until 11 o'clock at night with the committee on December 19, and the next day, when they thought they were going to get the resolution through, the whole bunch of them were in the gallery looking down here weeping for the little girl or the little boy, claiming mercy for them because of the women and children and the wives and mothers of the ex-service men. My God, they never thought about it. They were thinking about the $500,000 that was coming into their pockets if such a resolution was passed.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not. That is what there is in this business. Gentlemen, I do not know in 10 years when there was a matter of this importance that has come before the House that the committee having charge of it was denied the opportunity to go into the facts and get an opportunity so we might present it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman deny the facts are not strung all along the 500 pages of the hearings?

Mr. RAKER. I am not criticizing the gentleman; I do not intend to; but am stating my idea of this resolution. We had no testimony on it. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, I made a motion to have a hearing, and I was voted down.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I remember——

Mr. RAKER. We started out——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will ask the gentleman if he denies the testimony, and I make the charge that the gentleman in order to delay this piece of legislation wanted to run through and have an individual investigation of the 2,400 and more immigrants, which would have been an impossible thing to do.

Mr. RAKER. I did not intend to delay, and I never have. I wanted to get the facts. I made the charge then, and I make the charge now, that if the facts were presented to this House there would not be 5 votes in favor of this resolution. You could not afford to stand for such a bad piece of legislation, breaking down the laws of the country in favor of the steamship companies. This testimony which the gentleman refers to related to another proposition altogether, not to these 2,400 and over here desired to be admitted by this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, in all the declamation to which we have listened, full of sound and fury, not one single opponent of this resolution has said "send them back, deport them"—not one; not one has suggested it. Mr. Chairman, in inaugurating a new and untried policy after 135 years' experience under the Constitution the only wonder is that this law has been as successfully administered as it has. [Applause.] Not a man has said "send them back." The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON], for whose veracity I have a very high regard, I think unintentionally misled some members of this committee when he stated or carried the idea that the admissions proposed by this resolution exceeded the aggregate provided for under the law. He should have said definitely that it exceeded the quota from the certain countries involved. The operation of this law has reduced immigration from 750,000 to 195,000 up to date, and the well-authenticated statement by men particularly close to this subject, with every opportunity to speak by the book, is that the immigration will not exceed 250,000 for the current year.

Gentlemen speaking on this resolution did not state the issue. They avoided it; they side-stepped it. They did not attack the law. They stated that some mysterious, unlocated influence is and has been at work to break down the law, and yet did not even cite a single instance where any officer charged with its enforcement had connived at its violation.

In most pathetic terms we have been presented with the catalogue of the deportation or rejection of 37,719 inadmissible aliens through a period of 20 years preceding this restriction because of idiocy, imbecility, epilepsy, constitutional, mental, or nervous inferiority, insanity, and so forth. Does the gentleman find any justification in these citations for his opposition to this resolution? Certainly the gentleman would not have admitted any of the 37,719 who were rejected or deported in conformity to law. The gentleman does not complain that the same provision of law is now being rigidly enforced. Does the gentleman mean since we have turned back so many thousand undesirables, we should now turn back a few hundred immigrants who are admissible except for the reason that they are in excess of the quota from their respective countries? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX] is painfully exercised because an immigrant is seeking admission among the list covered by this resolution, because it is shown she is coming to her uncle, who is well able to care for her, so that she will not become a public charge, and complains that there are many other similar instances. Well, what does the gentleman want? Would he prefer we should admit a pauper or one who is liable to become a public charge? The gentleman is a good lawyer and knows well that the requirements in this particular are rigidly enforced.

Mr. Chairman, there is but one question involved, and it has been clearly stated by the chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. Shall we do what we have the unquestioned power to do, pass this resolution and admit a few here and there in excess of the inflexible number fixed by law, or shall we say, with what seems to me an almost brutal and certainly a cruel disregard of the finer instincts of humanity, we will enforce the law and make no exception? We will not mitigate its harshness; no, not if it separates the mother from her baby, the husband from the wife, the little boy or girl from his citizen father and mother in a good American home. Gentlemen, I will not so vote. In answer to my name my lips would refuse to pronounce the word "no." And so long as the kindlier instincts of humanity shall stir my soul, when no national interest is jeopardized, my sympathy and my vote will never be cast to separate a mother from her baby.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of the Immigration and Naturalization Committee for over seven years. Never before in the history of this House and of this committee have I seen any gentleman rise here and make remarks along the lines which have been made by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] as to what occurred in the committee room on the evening when one of the steamship representatives appeared before the committee. I say to you that the steamship representative came before the committee at the particular request of the committee, because we were seeking information.

At page 230 of the hearings we find the following testimony:

STATEMENT OF MR. R. H. FARLEY, ASSISTANT PASSENGER TRAFFIC MANAGER, PANAMA PACIFIC LINE, INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE CO., 9 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. FARLEY. I represent the International Mercantile Co. Our president was here this morning, and there is very little I can add to what he so ably presented.

Mr. BOX. That was Mr. Franklin?

Mr. FARLEY. Yes, Mr. Franklin. I simply came here at the suggestion of Congressman SIEGEL.

Mr. SIEGEL. We all had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Farley, if you will recollect, when we were on the Adriatic.

Mr. FARLEY. I want to assure you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that I appreciate the fact that the chairman and yourselves recognize that the steamship companies had a problem to deal with in carrying out the execution of the law. That we have done so well to me is remarkable. I recall that when the law went into effect we asked the authorities, the commissioner general—we pointed out to him that, in our opinion, the best way would be to govern quotas by departures from Europe, pointing out the difficulty otherwise to properly enforce it on basis of arrivals. However, it was not found possible to put that into effect; but, to my mind, to regulate the movement by departures rather than arrivals is the solution, and in any legislation contemplated I think that should be arranged.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a single man, woman, or child of these 2,453 whom they want to be returned to the other side who would be shipped back at the expense of the steamship companies. The law is plain in regard to that. And why all this hairsplitting? Who are these 2,453 immigrants? Ninety per cent of them are women and children—many of them are mothers of men who gave their lives on the other side during the World War fighting under our flag. I hold here a picture of one of the boys whose life was given up on the other side on October 8, 1918, and among his papers was found a request that his mother come to this side. She got her visé in May, arrived in December, and was ordered excluded because the quota was exhausted. Secretary of Labor Davis, under the power vested in him under the immigration act of 1917, permitted her to enter America. I want to say that all these cases are somewhat along that line. When the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] attempts to tell you that these steamship companies are appealing to keep these men and women and children here in order to save money, he is telling you something which, to use charitable words, is not a fact. I might use stronger language to emphasize what I mean, but the House understands.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I will.

Mr. VAILE. If they were deported they would be deported at the expense of the United States, would they not?

Mr. SIEGEL. Either at the expense of the Government or of their relatives if they would volunteer to pay for their return transportation. The law is plain in regard to that particular subject. These people came to America of their own accord originally, and the United States consul in each case received $10 to visé their passports. These visés were granted by our own officials abroad, who apparently were not informed of the exhaustion of the quota. If our consuls did not know, how could these immigrants know?

Mr. VAILE. The steamship companies would profit by the deportation because they would be paid by the United States.

Mr. SIEGEL. There is no doubt about that, because we have a contingent fund for the return of aliens.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman deny that Mr. Sanford, Mr. Farley, and Mr. Franklin insisted before the committee on the night of December 19 that they should be admitted in accordance with this resolution?

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Franklin appeared in the daytime. The only witness appearing in the evening was Mr. Farley, because he returned at my particular request.

The 500 pages of testimony were taken, not only in the daytime but at nighttime as well. This committee has worked day and night for months for the purpose of gathering testimony. No person can understand the immigration problem with its numerous ramifications affecting life and death of individuals unless he will read this testimony. And I say right now and once more, and I defy the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] or anyone else to prove to the contrary, that these 2,453 people are not women and children mainly who are coming here. To whom? Their own next of kin. We all know what the situation was when the law went into effect. We know that the testimony establishes that these couple of hundred children and others had gotten their visés in May, before the law went into effect, and it took a long time for them to come here. The stories of the hardships, sufferings, and cruelties many of them had undergone were bound to move the hearts of fair-minded men and women, in whose hearts there is no hate. I appealed to the President when some of the cases arose and told him what the situation was, and I say that the Secretary of Labor had the right to admit them temporarily under the act of 1917. The United States District Court in the Southern District of New York only a few days ago took the same view as I did and held that the act of 1917 is still in existence, and that the act of 1921 was simply an addition, because if you took a contrary view, then the entire law of 1917 might be deemed to have been wiped off the statute books. All that we did in 1921 was to put in the 3 per cent quota law as an amendment to the act of 1917.

What are you going to do with these women and children? Where are you going to send them? Are you going to say to the American people that this Congress is not going to exercise the power which it possesses, a power of mercy, fair dealing, and humanity? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen who have spoken here in opposition to the resolution probably forgot the testimony given before the committee that orphan children returned to Constantinople were murdered. The following poem may remind them of what they would see repeated if this resolution should fail. It is entitled—

ARMENIANS AT ELLIS ISLAND.

(By Isabel Fiske Conant.)

"We will go to America," said one.
"It is a land of kindness and of plenty.
There'll be a place there for us, in its sun;
Some one will hear of us; some sweet-and-twenty,
Told of war's aftermath, touched by its welter,
Instead of giving one more evening ball
Will give us somewhere shelter;
Some lonely woman, who has lost her all Except her wealth. . . ." "Some church will," said another;
"Yes, we must go; there's no hope else," they said.
"It's brotherhood. . . . Would that our elder brother
Once more were risen radiant from the dead!"

Twixt doubt and hope they left Armenia—
"At least it will put off the evil day,"
One, grimly, said. They hailed America,
After a storm-tossed and imprisoned way. . . .
They were beyond the quota for September.
A group of seventeen—fair-looking folk—(Recording Angel! may you not remember
'Gainst us those unheard prayers they spoke!)
Pictured one Sunday in the supplement,
Souls in their faces begged us not to shirk.
For all that, nothing happened. . . . They were sent,
Women and children all, back to the Turk. . . .
They all were murdered, but were outraged first (Multiple Calvary, watched by Christian States).

It's since the war that war has done its worst.
And stricken is the sentry at our gates;
Torch-bearing Liberty. . . . And now again
Another group is here! This time we know
What waits for them, deported . . . with what pain
Must Christ's old wounds reopen, if they go!
Spare His torn feet and hands. . . .
(The heart of evil in the world is wild.)
Make known love's succor to the pleading lands,
His day, the birthday of a little Child.

—(From the New York Times.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (No. 279) to permit to remain within the United States certain aliens admitted temporarily under bond in excess of quotas fixed under authority of the immigration act of May 19, 1921.

Resolved, etc., That aliens who entered the United States before March 7, 1922, in excess of quotas fixed under authority of the act entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved May 19, 1921, and were temporarily admitted under bond may, if otherwise admissible, and if not subject to deportation for other causes, be permitted by the Secretary of Labor to remain in the United States without regard to the provisions of such act of May 19, 1921. In the case of any alien so permitted to remain the bond shall be canceled.

The following committee amendment was also read:

Committee amendment: Page 1, line 3, strike out the figure "1" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "7."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, this committee amendment is typical of the whole thing. It was put in there to accommodate a certain group. That is what put it in.

Mr. SABATH. What group, may I ask?

Mr. BOX. They were people in whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] was especially interested.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I will.

Mr. SIEGEL. I will state that the amendment was reported because a child happened to be born in Poland and the father was in Russia, and they applied for citizenship papers in New York and could not get them because of the fact that his wife was not there.

Mr. BOX. I call your attention to the statement in the committee report that these cases had been passed on individually, so as to find out whether or not they were cases of special hardship, which is the excuse for this resolution. I read from the committee report:

To avoid great hardships, the Secretary of Labor ordered releases under conditions as above.

All of these temporary admissions were made on individual showings.

Now, gentlemen, read the order as I presented it in my remarks a few moments ago. That order was made on the 24th of December. It ordered the admission of all who were at the New York and Boston immigration stations, then numbering 1,200, more or less, all who were in ships out in the harbor or on the seas, or in any port of the United States, or who might arrive at any port of the United States on or before January 25. And we have this statement that each case had been passed on individually for you to act on, that these cases were passed on individually. There are things involved, gentlemen, I say to you—and I hope with proper moderation—in this course that are utterly ruinous in their tendency. These people were admitted while they were on the seas. There were 2,300 on shipboard in the harbor and 380 coming up the bay at New York. I do not know how many were coming in or coming to all other ports. Besides there were 1,200 then at the two ports of New York and Boston at that very time, and yet they tell you that those people out there on the seas had been investigated, every case had been tried, and that each had been found to be a special case of distress, and that as a matter of humanity they must let them in.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 9235) providing for a grant of land to the State of Washington for public park purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9606) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCNARY, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. SHEPPARD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What does the gentleman desire?

Mr. RAKER. I want five minutes on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from California for or against the amendment?

Mr. RAKER. I am against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington rises in opposition to it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I am not in opposition to it.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Washington is in favor of the amendment, and the gentleman from California is against it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, of which the gentleman from California shall have 5 minutes and I 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I supposed the gentleman would give the House or some of these Members a chance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not want to use unnecessary time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves that the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in support of my statement to the Members of the House, I want to call your attention to section 18 of the immigration act of February 5, 1917, which says:

That all aliens brought to this country in violation of law shall be immediately sent back in accommodations of the same class as those in which they arrived—

And it then goes on to provide that the steamship companies shall pay all expenses. The Commissioner of Immigration and his assistants all concede that the steamship companies must pay the expenses of these people while in the United States if they are brought here unlawfully.

Mr. MANN. Does not that say they must be immediately deported?

Mr. RAKER. That is what this law requires.

Mr. MANN. I know; but when they are admitted in bond they can not be immediately deported.

Mr. RAKER. What I am trying to convey to the House——

Mr. MANN. What I am trying to convey to the House is the fact, not an interpretation.

Mr. RAKER. This is the fact. The record shows that 2,400 and some odd people were illegally brought into the United States in violation of the law. The duty of the Secretary of Labor was to order them deported. He ordered them deported. Then, by virtue of widely extended requests, he temporarily admitted them, without any law to permit him to do it. I say that you can not find a scrap or a sentence in the law anywhere to the effect that the Secretary of Labor or the Commissioner General of Immigration has the right or the power to admit anyone illegally or unlawfully brought to the United States.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman still claim that the steamship companies shall be compelled to take them back at their own expense now?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, of course, it is all wrong to enforce the law. In that case the steamship companies and their friends have worked a ruse on the department, and they are going to save themselves, by the failure of our authorities to deport these people, something like $500,000. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that under the law the department has not the power to admit them?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But they did admit them.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; a man can commit murder if he wants to.

Mr. MANN. But they did admit them. It is like the case of the man in jail who is told by his counsel that he can not be put in jail.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. The gentleman has shown that under existing law the steamship company would have to pay the expense of deporting these people who were illegally admitted. Now, if the Commissioner General of Immigration permitted them to come in here, did he require the steamship company to execute a bond to the effect that they would carry out the provisions of the law in the event it should be decided to deport them?

Mr. RAKER. We did not get opportunity to require that that should be done.

Mr. CLOUSE. If he had done his duty, would he not have required such a bond as that?

Mr. RAKER. I think the bond would have been illegal and worthless, because he had no power to require the bond to be given. The law does not permit him to accept the bond. If he had required a bond or had required the execution of a bond, and he had no authority to do that, the bond would have been worthless.

Mr. CLOUSE. I concede that to be true. But he had no right in the first place to admit them.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call your attention to the first provision, the only provision that can possibly be referred to. That is in section 3 of the act of April 5, 1917, and it has this language:

Provided, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall issue rules and prescribe regulations, including the exaction of such bonds necessary to control and regulate the admission and return of otherwise inadmissible aliens applying—

Applying for what? "For temporary admission." All of these people were seeking to come here permanently and seeking to stay here. It is conceded by the department that they have no right to admit a man here who comes to the United States to remain permanently. This is only to apply to the admissions provided for, and it was only done by the extreme solicitation, by the almost overwhelming power brought to bear, that the Secretary made these orders to let these people in here, even before they arrived in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to correct some misstatements and set my colleagues right, if I can, as to some misinformation that they seem to possess. The House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization sat week in and week out, with many night sessions, trying to perfect amendments to the 3 per cent act. Some of these amendments, designed to make the law more workable, will be offered to you at an early date.

If these are not attached in the Senate to the House resolution extending the time of the 3 per cent act, which was recently passed by a vote of 281 to 36, they will be offered here by special resolution. One of these amendments deals with the boundary situation. European immigrants who are piling up in Canada, Mexico, and Cuba, hoping to beat our present restrictive act, will not be permitted to do so. Other amendments, we hope, will take care of some of the situations which made necessary the resolution which is now before you.

We have the temporary 3 per cent restriction act. We are not going to lose that act. We are not going to break it down. We are going to strengthen it. In my opinion, the United States, having ceased to be an asylum for the oppressed, can afford to be the least bit humane in getting its new law under way. Because we are ending the melting-pot fallacy and we know now our grievous blunder of unrestricted immigration, and are now changing front, we need not send back to the bloody Turks a hundred or so Armenian babes.

Let me repeat, extensive hearings, running for weeks and months, were held by the committee, including numerous night sessions. They were wide open to all. Everybody came, and those that did not, like the Labor Department and Immigration Bureau officials, we invited. Among those present and entitled to be heard were, as has been said, steamship officials, but there is nothing to the innuendo that there was any undue influence anywhere by anyone.

Of the 2,443 in excess of quota which this resolution proposes to admit, let me call attention to the fact that 1,000 or more of them could not be deported to any country—to any place in the world—resolution or no resolution! You can not send back certain people who fled from Syria, Assyria, and Turkish Armenia months before there was a quota law. You can not send certain Spaniards back to Spain when they left the United States in fishing vessels before there was a quota and got back from their fishing trips to find the quota law in existence and the quota from Spain exhausted in the first two months of the law. The immigration from Spain numbered 18,821 in 1920 and 23,818 in 1921, so that the excess of 97 during the time under consideration, it seems to me, represents a very small surplus in view of the fact that Spain's quota was only 663 for the present fiscal year. We have an excess quota from Spain of 97! Is not that remarkable in the working of a new law when Spanish immigration dropped from 23,818 to almost nothing in a year?

The excess of 432 from Turkey is due principally to Armenians and to some extent to Greeks, who were admitted in order to avoid grave and unusual hardship. They have been referred to in this debate as Turks, and they are, but only because Turkey was their birthplace and in complete disregard of their adopted country.

The excess of 444 from "other Asia" is probably almost entirely made up of the so-called Assyrians, who were natives of Persia. These people, for the most part, left their temporary homes in Mesopotamia for the United States before the act of May 19, 1921, passed Congress, and the strongest kinds of appeals from various religious and philanthropic organizations were made in their behalf. They are remnants of massacred families.

I am accused of writing several relief resolutions, one as far back as December 19. I did, and the steamship men had nothing whatever to do with it. I was thinking of those unfortunates and the law itself.

Further, in this House on December 22 last, I made some remarks on the workings of the 3 per cent act, and I announced then that I would offer to the House the very resolution you have before you to-day. I said then that the 3 per cent act, in its first try out, had developed some weak spots which could and should be corrected by Congress itself. I said then:

Some of those people, under a strict reading of the law, must be returned to the stricken regions in Asia Minor where constant war rages between the Bolshevik on the north and the followers of Mohammed on the south, who preach death on the edge of the sword of Islam, and who kill Christian and Jew alike; and so help me God, I will not stand idly by and let the United States send back these people if we can save them.

I said that then. I say it now.

During the six months ended December 31, 1921, a total of 985 aliens were actually debarred at United States ports because coming in in excess of the quotas prescribed by the act of May 19. This number has been increased somewhat since January 1 by very small numbers, as follows:

January	72
February	96

or a total of 1,153.

You heard read here a telegram from a Hungarian newspaper, a telegram sent to me. The inquiry developed that a mistake had been made in the Hungarian quota figures and some 200 Hungarians who supposed they were admissible were held up as a result of the clerical error over Christmas. That is all there is to that.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. One minute. That mistake was not corrected until the middle of February. I want to be fair. 'Tis human to err.

I have brought in this joint resolution in good faith. I think the step is a right and proper thing for Congress to do. Congress makes laws. This is to be a law.

I am afraid gentlemen who have signed the minority report, at last after years and years of no politics in our committee, appear to be injecting politics into the consideration of this question. They seem to charge that the Secretary of Labor did what he should not have done. But they do not say one word about the last Secretary of Labor, who, among other similar things, finally before he went out of office admitted under bond some 200 insane persons, probably one-half of them now married to American citizens in the country, who can not now be deported and here to breed long lines of insane people. They admitted them without coming to Congress. They admitted hundreds and hundreds of people who should not have been admitted, 10,000 sick, insane, and diseased in one year. Those objectionable aliens are in this country now by edict of that Secretary, who did not ask Congress for one word of authority.

We in one year's time have enacted a law which has reduced immigration in eight months from a probable million to 200,000. In that gigantic transformation from an asylum for the oppressed of all lands to a country of real restriction, we have on hand 2,443 exemptions, excesses, the slips, mistakes, and excusable cases of a new and drastic law, and a war-torn world whose changes could not be foreseen. The asylum idea is over forever, and so is the myth of the melting pot, I hope. Gentlemen may charge what they please. We have come to Congress in all fairness to give Congress its chance to pass a new law that gives a measure of grace, a mode of relief, an act of fairness or of necessity, or whatever you care to call it, and in order that the new law may be made practical and more popular.

I ask for a vote. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution favorably with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration H. J. Res. 279, to permit to remain within the United States certain aliens admitted temporarily under bond in excess of quotas fixed under authority of the immigration act of May 19, 1921, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the joint resolution and amendment to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. May the amendment be read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the joint resolution and the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That aliens who entered the United States before March 1, 1922, in excess of quotas fixed under authority of the act entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved May 19, 1921, and were temporarily admitted under bond, may, if otherwise admissible and if not subject to deportation for other causes, be permitted by the Secretary of Labor to remain in the United States without regard to the provisions of such act of May 19, 1921. In the case of any alien so permitted to remain the bond shall be canceled.

With the following amendment:

On page 1, line 3, after the word "March," strike out the figure "1" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "7."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 105, noes 35.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-one Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution. Those in favor will, as their names are called, vote yea, those opposed nay, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 243, nays 91, answered "present" 2, not voting 92, as follows:

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I voted "no." I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ELLIS] and I will withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the House joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the joint resolution just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business for the balance of the day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to dispense for the balance of the day with the business of Calendar Wednesday. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Wyoming what will be taken up?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] desires to present a conference report on the seed bill. If that is disposed of without the use of very much time, we may go to the debate on the Army bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask whether the gentleman of the minority of the Subcommittee on Appropriations has been advised of this request?

Mr. MONDELL. I think so; the gentleman from Iowa is here, and can inform the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not talking about the seed bill, but the Army appropriation bill. Has the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] been advised?

Mr. MONDELL. It is simply a matter of further general debate, and I understand there would only be one speech if we went to that debate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On that side of the Chamber?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming to dispense with further Calendar Wednesday business?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee, on account of illness.

APPROPRIATION TO PURCHASE SEED GRAIN, ETC.—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 2897, to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas in the United States, said amount to be expended under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The Clerk read the report and statement as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2897) to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, and 6, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum $1,000,000 proposed by said amendment insert "$1,500,000"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"An act to appropriate $1,500,000 for the purchase of seed grain to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

And the House agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the amendment of the House numbered 4.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 2897) to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

Nos. 1, 2, and 3 relate to the $1,000,000 made available for the purchase of feed for the relief of live stock.

No. 5 authorizes an appropriation of $1,000,000 instead of $5,000,000, as proposed by the Senate.

No. 4 inserts the word "authorize," so as to authorize the appropriation of $1,000,000 instead of appropriating $5,000,000, as proposed by the Senate.

No. 6 strikes out the words "of which not more than $1,000,000 may be used for the purchase of feed for relief of live stock" and inserts the words "and not more than $20,000 may be used, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, by the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of this act."

The amendment of the House to the title authorizes an appropriation of $1,000,000 instead of appropriating $5,000,000, as proposed by the Senate, and strikes out the words "and of feed," thus limiting the authority to make advances or loans to farmers, where the Secretary shall find that special need for such assistance exists, for the purchase of wheat, oats, barley, and flaxseed for seed purposes, and when necessary, to procure such seed and sell same to such farmers.

G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. MCLAUGHLIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, amendments 1, 2, and 3 relate to the $1,000,000 made available for the purchase of feed. If the conference report is agreed to no part of the money will be available for the purchase of feed. Amendment No. 5 authorizes an appropriation of $1,000,000 instead of $5,000,000, as proposed by the Senate. The Senate recedes with an amendment making the amount $1,500,000. Amendment No. 4 inserts the word "authorize" instead of making an appropriation. As proposed by the Senate, the House amendment authorizes an appropriation to be made. That amendment has not been agreed to. Amendment No. 6 strikes out the words "not more than $1,000,000 may be used for the purchase of feed," and inserts the language "providing $20,000 for expenses," in the District of Columbia and elsewhere. The amendment agreed to the title is to conform with the text.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Has the gentleman any idea of the amount that he will recommend for the next year?

Mr. HAUGEN. We will cross the bridge when we get to it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman has not yet made up his mind?

Mr. HAUGEN. We trust that no appropriation will be necessary.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Has the gentleman made up his mind that he will recommend an appropriation any year in which they fail to make a crop?

Mr. HAUGEN. I think that policy should be determined by the House.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Whenever there is a necessity for making an appropriation the gentleman from Iowa is in favor of it, is he?

Mr. HAUGEN. Of course, if Congress establishes that policy, yes. I am not very enthusiastic over that policy.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman from South Carolina guarantee an abundance of rainfall on this territory for the next two years?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I only wanted to know if the gentleman was in favor of making the appropriation when there was no crop.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think if these people can not make a success at farming in that area they had better try something else.

Mr. LAYTON. Will they guarantee the State against losses by frost? We have lost crops in our State from frost.

Mr. HAUGEN. We have lost in Iowa also.

Mr. LAYTON. They ought to if the Federal Treasury is to pay for all these losses.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Delaware better move to a territory where frost will not afflict him.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Nebraska mean to imply by the question he asked of the gentleman from South Carolina that if it does not rain they will try to grow wheat in that territory out there where God never intended it to grow?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I make no guaranty on the subject. I simply asked the gentleman what he would do on the subject of rainfall.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was asking about the implication.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. We can not control the rainfall, but we can control appropriations.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Sometimes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The Republican side of the House ought to be able to do it, but it seems unable to do so.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. How did the conferees arrive at the amount of $1,500,000? When the bill passed the Senate evidently through the advocacy of its enthusiastic admirers over there it passed with an amount of $5,000,000. I understand it passed unanimously. When the bill was considered before our committee its advocates contended for $2,000,000, and the committee, though not unanimously, reported the bill for $2,000,000. Then, when it came to a suspension of the rules, the advocates of it evidently were satisfied with a million dollars, because the gentleman from Iowa himself offered the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill at $1,000,000. That failed. Then, when a special rule was brought in to provide for its consideration, it passed the House at $1,000,000. Evidently the advocates in the House were satisfied with that. I am wondering at the other body coming down from $5,000,000 to a million and a half; evidently it meets the hilarious approval of the advocates of the measure in the House, who in that way have obtained $500,000 more than they were asking in the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. As I stated before, the Senate bill carried $5,000,000. The House cut it to $1,000,000. I believe it was made clear in the House that the House would not stand for a large appropriation. Therefore it was the duty of the managers on the part of the House to insist on the lowest amount possible; it seems to me that when we agreed to a million and one-half, or an increase of $500,000, and the Senate conceded seven times that amount, it is all that could be expected.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was just a little bit surprised at the condescension of the other body.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. How many States will this be used in?

Mr. HAUGEN. So far as we know, probably three or four States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is, Wyoming, Montana, and North Dakota?

Mr. HAUGEN. The two Dakotas?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, if the gentleman will permit, no part of this sum is to be used in Wyoming. There was no suggestion of that sort until the gentleman from Mississippi made it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I wanted to make an observation, Mr. Speaker. I believe the gentleman from Iowa yielded to me.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understand it, the effect of the conference report is to leave the bill just as it passed the House, except that the amount to be loaned is increased from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; except so far as the authorization is concerned, that has not been agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That would leave $500,000 each for the three States. Does the gentleman think that will be sufficient to elect the three Senators in those States next fall?

Mr. HAUGEN. I am not advised as to politics in the various States, and I can not answer that question.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Iowa please inform me why it is that it gets dryer out there as we approach the Canadian border. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAUGEN. It is very dry out there.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I want the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS]. In regard to the appropriation, I was opposed to the $2,000,000. I was willing to accept the $1,000,000, and I believe I am now willing to accept the million and one-half; but so far as guaranteeing the rainfall is concerned, I merely wanted to say that we Democrats expect to be in power very soon, but not in power to that extent.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. You will promise that, anyway. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOWREY. And when we get into power a lot of us are going to do all we can to make the country dry instead of wet.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. In reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, I am glad to say that Nebraska will have none of this fund, but out in Nebraska we will have the full vote cast, and we will not rely upon a fraction of the vote of the State to make the State dry.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, a fraction of Nebraska has gone down to Florida, however. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOMINICK) there were—ayes 91, noes 54.

So the conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment still in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 4: Page 2, line 11, after the word "hereby," insert the words "authorized to be."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment No. 4.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the room at the moment. I see other members of the committee here. Of course the effect of this amendment——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, I will state that I conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations about this proposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And it is satisfactory to the chairman, is it?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course if the Committee on Appropriations chooses to abdicate its functions I suppose we can not help it.

Mr. MANN. It is not a matter of abdicating any functions. This is a practical matter, as the gentleman understands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recede from the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment No. 4.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

CONFERENCE REPORT—DEPARTMENTS OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. SHREVE. To present a conference report from the Appropriations Committee covering the Department of Commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania presents a conference report on the bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ordered printed under the rule.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10871, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10871, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins I would like to ask what the record shows as to time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has 146 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has 120 minutes remaining.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss that item of this bill which undertakes to appropriate funds for the improvement and maintenance of all the navigable rivers and harbors of the United States and its Territories. I desire also to discuss transportation and rates as affected by waterways.

Our chief difficulty in procuring adequate appropriations for river and harbor improvement in this country results from the fact that there are few among us who have any conception as to the enormity or importance of our river and harbor projects. If the possibilities of water transportation and its benefits to commerce were more generally understood, our appropriations would be tremendously increased. At any rate, I think I can convince you that the amount provided in this bill, $27,635,260, is totally inadequate to meet the country's needs.

Some months ago the Chief of Engineers of the War Department requested the district engineers, in charge of the various districts of the United States, to report estimates of the money needed during the next fiscal year to do the absolutely urgent river and harbor work in their respective districts. When the reports were all in the Chief of Engineers added the estimates and found that they made a total of $61,337,911.

At the urgent request of the leaders of this House the Chief of Engineers went over the estimates prepared by the district engineers, and in the interest of strict economy cut them to the bone, reporting only such amounts and upon such projects as, in his judgment, the commerce of the country absolutely demanded. The total of his estimates prepared upon this basis amounted to $42,815,661. These estimates applied only to projects heretofore adopted by Congress. In addition to these adopted projects, however, the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House has reported a bill authorizing new projects which will cost in excess of $31,000,000, and the Chief of Engineers recommends that certain of these new projects are so important that $14,922,220 of this amount should be expended upon them as speedily as possible. Thus it will be observed that the amounts necessary for the continuation of work on the projects heretofore adopted, together with amounts for new projects, will make a sum total necessary for river and harbor work next year amounting to $57,737,881.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield, is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Subcommittee on Appropriations considering the river and harbor appropriations for the next year did not take into consideration the needs of appropriations for projects that have been recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors? That item of expenditure has not been considered at all by the Committee on Appropriations. We did consider the amount needed in aid of existing authorized projects. Later on I shall try to state to the House the reasons for our favoring $27,000,000 to carry on the work of all worthy projects recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I know as a matter of fact that some of these new projects are very urgent, and the Chief of Engineers recommended that approximately $15,000,000 be made available for their improvement at once, and I know furthermore that the people who are sponsoring these new projects are expecting a part of the $27,000,000 to be allotted for work upon them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have one in my own State, which the Chief of Engineers says is most worthy, and yet no part of this $27,000,000 will be utilized for that purpose. If the bill goes through authorizing these new additional projects, undoubtedly the committee will recommend additional appropriations for them.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. I do not understand that the report of the Chief of Engineers comprehended any new projects whatever.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. It did not.

Mr. LAYTON. It was a minimum amount which he set, based upon the reports of the engineers of the whole country, as being the minimum amount absolutely necessary for existing and authorized projects.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is true. And then in addition to that the Chief of Engineers in a supplemental report says that $14,922,220 of the amount provided for in the new bill should be made available at once, and I know that the advocates of the new projects are expecting that this lump-sum appropriation shall be available for their projects.

Mr. KINDRED. Does the gentleman make any distinction between the projects which have been authorized and on which money has been spent and the projects which have been authorized and upon which no money has been spent?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I presume there are some projects authorized in the past upon which no money has been spent.

Mr. KINDRED. And which may be very urgent?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I think that is probably true. And in reply to the gentleman I will say that I think that some of these new projects are very urgent.

Mr. KINDRED. Just as urgent as those on which money has been spent?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. From the information I have, I think that statement is true.

The Appropriations Committee of the House, upon whose shoulders has devolved the enormous task of making adequate and economical appropriations for all the departments and activities of this Government, has adopted the estimates allotted in the Budget for river and harbor improvement amounting to $27,635,260. The great difficulty results from the fact that the officers who made up the budget had little knowledge of the river and harbor needs of the country and with the mass of work before them they had no time to investigate this subject.

It has been declared to be the purpose of the Appropriations Committee and of the leaders of this House to deal with river and harbor improvements upon the same basis as we have dealt with them during the past two fiscal years. I have faith that I can convince you, however, that in this purpose they have failed.

For the fiscal year 1920 we appropriated $12,000,000 for river and harbor improvement. But at the time we made that appropriation we had in the Treasury theretofore appropriated for river and harbor work a sum total of $58,800,000, thus making available for river and harbor improvement during that year a sum total of $70,800,000. And we appropriated for the year 1921 the sum of $15,000,000, but at the time we made that appropriation we had available in the Treasury, already appropriated for river and harbor work, the sum of $37,500,000, thus making available for the year 1921, for river and harbor improvement, the sum of $52,500,000.

The testimony of the engineers recently given before the Rivers and Harbors Committee shows that by the end of the present fiscal year practically all moneys available in the Treasury for river and harbor improvement will have been exhausted. As a matter of fact, since the war and until recently, the cost of river improvement has been so excessive that the engineers, in the interest of economy, have done little work except that which they felt to be absolutely necessary for maintenance. But the engineers in their testimony state that prewar conditions have been sufficiently restored in the cost of river and harbor work that such improvements now cost little more than they did before we entered the war, and, as a result, during the last few months they have been making progress, but now they are handicapped for want of funds, and this condition will grow steadily worse until June, when substantially all the funds will be exhausted.

As stated before, in 1920 we had $58,800,000 available in the Treasury. We appropriated that year an additional sum of $12,000,000, and last year we appropriated $15,000,000, making a total of $85,800,000, which we made available and which has been expended in maintenance and improvement of meritorious existing projects during the last two fiscal years. In other words, the engineers have actually expended in necessary river and harbor work the sum of $42,900,000 during each of the past two fiscal years, and they tell us that the absolute needs of the country for next year amount to $42,815,661.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. Is it not true that if the appropriation is cut any considerable amount below $42,000,000 the large harbors, where commerce already exists, will have the strong claim for the available funds, and that our inland rivers will be the ones to suffer as a result of such cut?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The gentleman is quite correct. We who are interested in the inland rivers have learned by experience that when inadequate lump-sum appropriations are made the pressure from large seaports upon the War Department is so strong that under the law, which provides that the money shall be expended in the interest of commerce, the department finds itself unable to allow sufficient funds to the inland rivers to make effective improvements thereon, and after this kind of experience during the past three years we are no longer fooled about the results of inadequate lump-sum appropriations, and that is why we Representatives from the valley are here stubbornly insisting upon appropriations sufficient to enable the engineers to take care of the harbors and still make reasonable allotments to our inland rivers.

Those of us who know the Chief of Engineers, Gen. Lansing H. Beach, and his assistant, Gen. Harry Taylor, and know their records for fairness and economy, and who have taken the time to go over the needs and merits of the projects upon which this money is to be expended, know that their estimates are reasonable and that it is not in the interest of economy to appropriate less than they have recommended.

From these facts and figures I am persuaded that any fair-minded man must concede that an appropriation of $27,635,260 is totally inadequate to meet our river and harbor needs and that the amount reported in the bill should be increased to at least $42,000,000.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. As I understand, the Chief of Engineers at first recommended that $61,000,000 could be profitably expended, but that, at the request of the leaders of the House, the engineers revised their estimates to a minimum—in other words, cut them to the bone—and that such revised estimates called for an appropriation of $42,000,000 as being absolutely necessary to carry on river and harbor work, and that with the urgent projects which are being provided for in the new bill $42,000,000 will not be enough by $15,000,000 to carry on the urgent and necessary work of the country.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The gentleman is entirely correct. It will require $57,737,881 to do the work which is urgent during the next fiscal year. But, of course, the engineers can do infinitely better with $42,000,000 than they can with $27,000,000.

Those responsible for this item in the bill contend that the cut was made in the interest of economy, and I will concede that in this hour of national stress economy is essential; but if we are to meet our national obligations we must develop our resources, and if we are to develop our resources we must have more adequate and cheaper forms of transportation, and we can not have this without the development and use of our inland waterways, and we can not develop our waterways without adequate funds with which to improve them.

The first essential to river navigation is an adequate channel, just as the first essential to rail transportation is a proper and safe roadway. A river for navigation is no better than its shallowest and narrowest section and can not be used any more than a railroad can be used between two given points until the last tie has been laid and the last rail nailed down, and so our great misfortune in river improvement has been due to the fact that while Congress has appropriated millions of dollars it has doled it out in such inadequate amounts that none of the projects have been completed. I will now give you the proof of this assertion.

On June 25, 1910, Congress undertook the improvement of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Missouri with a view to establishing an 8-foot channel from Cairo to St. Louis, and a 6-foot channel from St. Louis to the mouth of the Missouri, the work to be completed within a period of 12 years at a cost of $21,000,000.

On June 25 next that 12-year period will have elapsed and yet Congress in its effort to carry out its plan to improve this project during the time allotted has appropriated only $1,970,000, and still our river critics are demanding to know why the Mississippi River between Cairo and St. Louis is not in more general use. If a railroad company had undertaken to build a railroad from Cairo to St. Louis in 1910 and had pursued a course such as Congress has pursued, how much freight do you think would have been hauled over such railroad between the points named? And to what extent do you think such railroad would now be in use?

On June 25, 1910, Congress undertook the improvement of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri to Minneapolis with a view to establishing a permanent 6-foot channel within a period of 12 years and at a cost of $27,000,000. On June 25 next the 12-year period within which these improvements were to have been made will have expired. Upon that project Congress has expended $12,250,000, and yet that enormous expenditure can not be utilized because the project has not been completed. There are still shallow places unimproved. In other words, the last tie has not been laid and the last rail nailed down, and, consequently, the vehicles of commerce can not move.

On July 25, 1912, Congress undertook the improvement of the Missouri River between Kansas City and its mouth with a view to establishing a permanent 6-foot channel within a period of 10 years, and at a cost of $20,000,000. Like the other projects just named, this project was adopted by a solemn act of Congress. The people of Kansas City, inspired by their faith in Congress and with a hope and realizing the need for cheap water transportation, raised by private subscription more than $1,000,000, and out of these funds they built docks, barges, and tow boats and undertook the navigation of the Missouri River and the establishment of commerce thereon.

In vain did they labor, for on July 25 next the 10-year period will have expired, and while Congress has appropriated during that time the sum of $7,500,000 the project is only one-third completed, and the river can not be used except in high water, because its sand bars have not been removed and its channel fixed. It has 350 miles of permanent 6-foot channel the year round, but for 50 miles there are sand bars, and as a result this large expenditure is not being utilized. And the people of Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, and the adjoining States are still deprived of the blessings which cheap water transportation would bring in carrying to the market their wheat, corn, hay, and manufactured products.

On June 25, 1910, Congress undertook the improvement of the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to the mouth, with a view to establishing a permanent 9-foot channel within a period of 12 years, at the cost of $63,731,000. On June 25 next that 12-year period will have expired. Congress in its efforts to carry out its plan has appropriated $43,624,000 upon this project. And yet this vast expenditure of money can not be utilized to any considerable extent, because the project is only two-thirds completed. The commerce from Pittsburgh and that great territory adjacent to the Ohio River is deprived of the benefits of cheap water transportation out to the sea and to the markets of the world because Congress, although spending millions of dollars upon this project, has failed to carry out its program as planned.

What we need in this country to-day, and what we have needed in this country during the last 12 years, is more business in Government, less pork-barrel appropriations, and more projects completed.

As every Member of this House is doubtless aware, the War Department has been operating a Barge Line upon the Mississippi River between St. Louis and New Orleans during the past year. St. Louis has expended $1,000,000 building a 900-foot concrete dock with modern loading and unloading equipment. When it was constructed it was thought to be adequate for years, but it has been outgrown by the commerce developed in one year's time and extensions will have to be constructed. From New Orleans to Cairo the river has been improved. Between these points full cargoes are moving the year round, but because Congress has failed to carry out its program for the improvement of that stretch of 120 miles between Cairo and St. Louis full cargoes can go from St. Louis through to New Orleans only when the water is high. At other seasons the cargoes have to be broken up at Cairo and the barges towed separately from Cairo to St. Louis by tugs, which is a wasteful interference with a successful operation.

It is asserted that we have an 8-foot channel the year round between Cairo and St. Louis. This is true, but the channel as now improved during the low-water season is wide enough only for single barges and packet boats. I doubt if the average Member of this House comprehends either the size or potentiality of a modern towboat with its cargo of barges making its way along the Mississippi River. When the water was high last season it occurred upon numerous occasions that one towboat would make the trip in six days from St. Louis to New Orleans with eight barges, carrying enough freight to load 12 full freight trains, each train carrying 50 loaded cars, with 50,000 pounds of merchandise to the car.

But a tow of barges, such as I have described, is 900 feet long and 150 feet wide, and while it can navigate upon an 8-foot channel, yet, with the river between Cairo and St. Louis in its present unimproved condition, its navigable channel being narrow in places, such a cargo in low water can not navigate the bends in the swift current without danger of its barges colliding with sand bars. If Congress had carried out its project and had appropriated the funds as planned, that stretch of the Mississippi between Cairo and St. Louis would now be improved, and cargoes, such as I have described, would be moving without interference practically 10 months in each year from St. Louis straight through to New Orleans.

One of the difficulties with which the barge line has had to contend and which has done much to prevent river navigation in this country has been the unfair and unreasonable rates which the Interstate Commerce Commission has permitted the railroads to charge upon their lines which parallel the rivers, and this likewise applies between coast points as well as between river points throughout the United States. Congress has given to the Interstate Commerce Commission full power to correct these abuses, but it has not done so. In order to illustrate and demonstrate the contention that unfair and unreasonable rates have been made upon rail lines which parallel the river, permit me to call your attention to a few specific instances of rates now in force, as I found them to be within the past 30 days, from the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission. For instance, the railroads haul to-day from New Orleans to St. Louis, a distance of 718 miles, 100 pounds of second-class freight for $1.73, while they charge for hauling the same amount of the same kind of freight from New Orleans to Fort Smith, Ark., a distance of 494 miles, but where no water competition exists, the sum of $1.84½. The railroads to-day haul 100 pounds of first-class freight from Portland, Me., to New Orleans, a distance of 1,685 miles, for the sum of $2.51, because water competition exists between these points, while they charge from Kansas City to New Orleans, a distance of 879 miles, but where no water competition exists, because the river has not been improved, the sum of $2.48½; while they charge from Omaha to New Orleans, a distance of 1,062 miles, $2.79½—one-third less distance, but a greater rate. And they charge from Denver to New Orleans, a distance of 1,349 miles, 300 miles less than from Portland, Me., to New Orleans, but where water competition is not possible, the sum of $3.04.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The railroads make low rates for competing with water transportation and then make the inland points pay for it.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; and Kansas has been making a very substantial contribution to this system.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. We have been making contributions for a good many years.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. No better illustration can be shown of the methods used by railroads to destroy water competition than the rate recently established between Minneapolis and St. Louis upon first-class freight. A barge line is about to begin operations upon the Mississippi between these points. The railroads went recently before the Interstate Commerce Commission and received authority to make a rate upon 100 pounds of first-class freight from Minneapolis to St. Louis, a distance of 586 miles, for $1.06½, while the same commission permits the railroad over a more level country from Minneapolis to Kansas City, 86 miles less distance, to charge for hauling the same kind and amount of freight the sum of $1.44, because no river runs direct from Minneapolis to Kansas City.

If the railroad can afford to carry freight from Minneapolis to St. Louis for $1.06½ per 100 pounds, it ought not to be permitted to charge 38 cents more to carry 100 pounds of the same kind of freight a less distance to Kansas City, and if the rate from Minneapolis to Kansas City is a reasonable one, then the railroad ought not be permitted to establish a confiscatory rate along the river, merely for the purpose of preventing river navigation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman would not advocate a refusal to permit the railroads to make rates to meet the competition of the actual waterway competition?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I would advocate prohibiting the railroads from collecting exorbitant rates upon inland lines to make up what they lose trying to destroy barge-line transportation upon our waterways.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is usually contended that when the rates were cut to enable the railways to compete with the water lines, that the rates are fixed so as to make a little more than out-of-pocket costs. The theory is that it would so destroy the system throughout the country that it would mean an increase of the rates where there was no water competition, so the real result is that we get a better service by permitting the competition of water rates.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I know they have fine-spun theories by which they seem to be rather successful in continuing the practice. I know, on the other hand, that the railroads of this country never have and never will be able to compete with water transportation successfully. There is only one way they can compete, and that is to make a rate less than cost along the water lines and recoup their losses by overcharging the shippers who live in territory where water transportation does not exist.

Another striking illustration of the influence of water competition upon railroad rates and of the discriminations which the people of the Mississippi Valley are compelled to endure because of the failure of Congress to improve our waterways, is shown by the fact that the railroads to-day will haul 100 pounds of paint from Boston to Seattle, a distance of 3,258 miles across all the mountains and prairies of this country, for $1.83½, because water competition exists around through the Panama Canal, while they charge $1.06½ for hauling the same amount of paint a distance of 916 miles across the prairies from St. Louis to Denver, but where water competition is not possible. In other words, the people of the valley are compelled to pay $1.06½ to have 100 pounds of paint hauled 916 miles across a level country, while the railroads haul the same amount of paint a distance of 2,342 miles across the mountains of this country for the sum of 77 cents, and all of this is done under authority conferred upon the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The railroads to-day haul 100 pounds of first-class freight 3,313 miles from San Francisco to Boston for $6.16, while they charge $5 to haul the same amount of the same class of freight 1,986 miles from San Francisco to Kansas City. Such discriminations against the interior of the country should not be allowed.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether they are violating the law, but the law provides for discriminatory rates at water points, and they are not allowed to put it below compensatory rates.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I know, but they have queer systems of bookkeeping.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. As I read the law, the railroads can not charge more than a compensatory rate to any people.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I know that is true according to law.

Mr. HOCH. Following out that line, would it not follow that if the rates in competition with water transportation are, as a matter of fact, compensatory, then rates to the interior are unquestionably high?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

If the railroads can afford to make the rates they do between Frisco and Boston and between Boston and Seattle, then they ought not be permitted to charge the rates which they impose upon the people of the Mississippi Valley. And if they can not afford to make the rates which they make between Boston and Seattle and between Frisco and Boston, then they ought not to be permitted to make such rates in competition with the merchant marine which we have expended $3,500,000,000 to establish. And if the railroads can afford to make such rates as I have described, then why was it necessary for Congress to appropriate out of the Treasury and to pay them as a result of the deficit under governmental operation the sum of $1,600,000,000 and to loan them $500,000,000 more?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not think that follows at all. The rate may be more than the out-of-pocket cost and yet not sufficient to be compensatory in the general sense of that term. It does not follow at all.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The law says "reasonably compensatory at river points." If you cut it to reasonably compensatory rates and higher elsewhere, the elsewhere is more than reasonably compensatory.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not at all; it is a different standard. When you take the compensatory rates with reference to water competition it is a different standard from the compensatory rate in a general way.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I will.

Mr. ROSE. I note from the chart exhibited by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON] that there is great discrimination in the rates charged by railroad companies between certain points, as shown on the chart. It would appear that the inland districts and cities are obliged, indeed compelled, to make up losses incurred by railroads where the roads are in competition with water transportation. If that be true, why is it that all inland towns and cities are not charged proportional rates instead of being called upon to pay discriminatory rates, which makes competition in certain commodities almost prohibitive. I agree with the general proposition that inland cities and towns should pay a higher freight rate than the rate in competition with water rates. Any point other than a terminus of a railroad must of necessity pay a larger freight rate, for the reason that the breaking of trains, shifting cars to sidings, and drilling trains can only be done at increased cost, so that location has much to do with freight rates by railroad transportation only. But from information from persons in position to know, I offer the suggestion that the rates are not uniform. A number of complaints have been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission because of unfair rates charged on lumber shipped to Pennsylvania from some of the Southern States. Our chamber of commerce, of Johnstown, Pa., has joined with other bodies in filing complaints with the commission. The unfair or discriminatory rates are not directly chargeable to the railroads entering the city of Johnstown; they have made every effort to bring relief to the business interests affected in the city of Johnstown. It so happens that Johnstown is compelled to suffer the brunt of the high freight rate. It may be that it will be found necessary to make a formal complaint to the commission, but our people are justly entitled to a revision of the rates without being compelled to expend large sums of money therefor. It may be that the southern lines will appreciate the situation and make proper adjustment of the rates to cities situated as is Johnstown and so make possible fair competition in many lines of endeavor. This appears to me the right place and time to present this situation.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I agree with the gentleman, and I think some system ought to be worked out so that our transportation systems can be made to cooperate and not be fighting each other all the time.

A striking illustration of this country's lack of business in Government may be found in the operation by the railroad administration of the railroad and barge line between St. Louis and New Orleans. With one arm of the Government the Director General of Railroads took $9,000,000 out of the Treasury with which to build barges and towboats in an effort to develop commerce upon the Mississippi River, while with another arm of the Government he wasted millions of dollars carrying freight upon railroads which parallel the river at less than cost trying to prevent commerce from developing upon the river. Again, I repeat, the need of our country is more business in government. And while Members of Congress from the valley States are helping to appropriate millions to improve the harbors along our seaboard and to reimburse the railroads for their losses, it would seem that a just reciprocity would demand that the Mississippi and its tributaries should be improved for navigation in order that the people who live in that great productive area of this country might be given an opportunity through the blessing of cheap transportation to develop the resources so abundant in that region.

The most deadly obstacle with which the barge line has had to contend, more destructive even than the cutthroat competition carried on by the rail lines which parallel the river, is the unfair division the barge line has to make with the railroads of the revenue collected for a joint rail-and-water haul. I know of no way to present this feature more effectively than by giving a number of concrete examples. I will quote the divisions of rates approved by Examiner Woodrow, representing the Interstate Commerce Commission in a case filed by the barge line and now pending before the commission, and I am advised that the proposed division of rates is merely a continuation of the rates prescribed by the railroad administration and still in force.

For instance, on first-class freight from St. Louis to Bayless, Ark., by a joint rail-and-water haul the rate is $1.55½ per 100 pounds. The rail line carries this freight 74 miles, while the barge line carries it 306 miles, and yet the rail line gets 88.5 cents for hauling it 74 miles, while the barge line is allowed only 67 cents for hauling the same freight 306 miles. In other words, the railroad carries the freight 15 per cent of the total haul and collects 57 per cent of the revenue.

Mr. LAYTON. Who fixed that rate?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That rate was fixed by the railroad administration just before they went out of office. But it is an abuse that ought to be corrected.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman please tell me how and by whom?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. It can be corrected all right.

Mr. LAYTON. By the Government?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Is not that the only solution?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; I think it is. You can see the difficulty of operating against this kind of discrimination.

Mr. LAYTON. Has the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix water rates?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The Interstate Commerce Commission has the power under the law to fix joint rail and water rates.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How many miles of that haul you referred to are by water and how many by rail?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The railroad hauls the freight 74 miles and takes 88½ cents of the freight and the barge line hauls it 306 miles and gets 67 cents of the freight.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. Is it not a fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the authority to regulate and correct the unjust discriminatory rates now in force and to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I will answer the gentleman's question by reading an extract from subdivision 3 of section 15 of the transportation act:

The commission may, and it shall whenever deemed by it to be necessary or desirable in the public interest, after a full hearing upon complaint or upon its own initiative without a complaint, establish * * * joint rates * * * applicable to the transportation of passengers or property * * * (or in the case of a through route where one of the carriers is a water line, the maximum rates, fares, and charges applicable thereto) and the divisions of such rates * * * as hereinafter provided, * * * and this provision, except as herein otherwise provided, shall apply when one of the carriers is a water line.

In the face of this language, can there be any question about either the right or the duty of the commission to correct abuses such as I have described? And if complaint is not made, then it should correct them upon its own initiative in the public interest. Yes; and in the interest of water transportation, which Congress has by law declared should be fostered and preserved in full vigor.

The shipper pays $1.48 per 100 pounds on first-class freight from St. Louis to Monroe, La., over a joint rail-and-water haul.

In the division of the revenue so collected the railroad takes 81 per cent for hauling the freight 37 per cent of the distance, while the barge line is allowed 19 per cent of the revenue collected for hauling the freight 63 per cent of the distance.

It costs $1.64 to haul 100 pounds of first-class freight over a joint rail and water line from St. Louis to Smithson, Ark. The railroad performs 36 per cent of the service and takes 88 per cent of the revenue.

It costs $1.28 to haul 100 pounds of first-class freight from St. Louis to Holly Springs, Miss. The railroad hauls the freight 10 per cent of the distance, but takes 50 per cent of the revenue collected, leaving to the barge line the other half of the revenue for performing 90 per cent of the service.

It costs $1.74 to haul 100 pounds of first-class freight over a joint rail and water line from St. Louis to Collinston, La. The railroad hauls this freight 35 per cent of the distance and takes 81 per cent of the revenue collected.

It costs $1.03½ to haul 100 pounds of freight over a joint rail and water line from New Orleans to Quitman, Miss. The railroad hauls this freight 40 per cent of the distance, but collects 96½ per cent of the revenue. In other words, the railroad hauls this freight 109 miles and receives $1 therefor, while the barge line hauls the same freight 165 miles and receives 3.5 cents.

It costs $1.32½ to haul 100 pounds of freight from New Orleans to Brownsville, Tenn., over a joint rail and water haul. The railroad hauls this freight 7 per cent of the distance and takes 41 per cent of the revenue.

It costs 87½ cents to haul 100 pounds of first-class freight over a joint rail and water haul from Mobile to Yolande, Ala. The railroad hauls this freight only 7 per cent of the distance and takes 42 per cent of the total revenue collected.

It costs $1.54 to haul 100 pounds of first-class freight from St. Louis to Stuttgart, Ark., over a joint rail and water haul. The railroad carries this freight 20 per cent of the total distance and takes 61 per cent of the revenue collected. From these illustrations you will understand the system used by the railroads for destroying water transportation by taking the major part of the revenue, while the barge line performs the greater part of the service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman should bear in mind the difference between the expense of maintaining and operating the water line and maintaining and operating the railroad. The railroad has to pay the expense of maintaining its right of way and it has other expenses which the water line has not.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is the point precisely. It costs the railroads infinitely more to transport a given amount of freight than it costs the barge line to transport an equal amount of freight, and the public has to pay the carrier the cost to it of the transportation plus a reasonable amount of profit, and if the public can get its commerce hauled by water at one-third or one-fourth the price at which the railroads can afford to haul such commerce, why should not the public avail itself of that advantage instead of continuing to pay the rate which it is now compelled to pay to the railroads? [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; but the waterways do not extend to all parts of the country.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is true; but let us give the public the benefit of cheap water transportation where waterways exist and then pay the railroads a compensatory rate, a rate which will pay their expenses and will give their stockholders a dividend occasionally between points where water competition does not exist. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman realizes that there is time freight and that there is dead freight?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I do.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is some freight in the hauling of which time is of the essence of the contract.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And there is other freight which may just as well be transported by the slower water route.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is true.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is the public willing to pay the difference?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Certainly. For first-class freight they can afford to pay what it costs to haul it, and the waterways should be utilized to haul the heavy, bulky freight, such as lumber, coal, building materials, sisal, burlap, coffee, sugar, and so forth, and the cars which are now being utilized for this purpose should be set free to supply the ever-increasing demand for transportation facilities in those sections of the country where waterways do not exist.

The unfair division of rates which I have described has been continued for two years, while full power was vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission to correct it, and that, too, in the face of an act of Congress approved more than two years ago, which contained the following language:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation service and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States, and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

Can it be contended with any show of color that the Interstate Commerce Commission is trying to preserve in full vigor the water transportation of this country when it permits the railroads to take 97 per cent of the total revenue collected for a joint rail and water haul when it performs only 40 per cent of the service, as is being done upon the Mississippi and Black Warrior Rivers?

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. If they paid that Black Warrior traffic manager $16,000 or $20,000 a year instead of $12,000 he might be able to get more than 4 per cent of the total freight. The Government runs that Black Warrior Line and gets 4 per cent of the freight charge, and the traffic manager gets $12,000 a year and has no traffic.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I am not advised as to the salary now being paid the manager of the Black Warrior section. I suspect that it is not exorbitant, but I do not believe that any salary which may be paid to the manager of that line would insure a successful operation with the present division of rates which the railroads demand of the barge line.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ] is very much mistaken when he says there is no traffic there.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. There is traffic there and the barge line is hauling it; but under the present division of rates it does not pay, and these rates were undoubtedly made for the purpose of destroying water transportation.

Mr. ARENTZ. When I say there is no traffic, I mean to say there is so little that you can hardly call it anything at all.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. A suit was filed before the Interstate Commerce Commission on the 11th day of October, 1920, pointing out these abuses and appealing to the commission to correct them. That suit has been pending for one year and four months, while the barge line is compelled to struggle on, enduring this frightful discrimination, while the railroads collect as high as 97 per cent of the revenue for 40 per cent of the service.

The water critic is frequently heard to proclaim that river navigation is not practicable and that money expended in that direction is wasted. If that is true, then why do the railroads carry commerce along water lines and between ocean points at an infinitely less rate than they carry the same commerce between points where water competition does not exist, and if river navigation is not practicable then why should it become necessary for the railroads to take three-fourths of the revenue for one-fourth of the service where commerce passes over a joint rail and water line?

As a matter of fact, cutthroat rates have long been practiced by the railroads in their efforts to prevent water transportation in this country, and they are not only destructive to river navigation but they are destructive to the railroads themselves. Experience shows that the railroads never have been and that they never will be able to successfully compete with water transportation, and every attempt that they make in that direction is a source of useless expense.

As a Member of Congress I voted for the Esch-Cummins bill and for every other bill which in my judgment would strengthen and sustain the railroads, and I have not changed my views upon that subject. The country needs railroads and must have them where a cheaper form of transportation does not exist. For their services they ought to be allowed to collect sufficient revenue to defray all their necessary expenses and to pay a reasonable dividend to the stockholders, but they should not be allowed to charge a confiscatory rate in one section of the country to destroy water transportation upon our rivers and then to charge exorbitant rates upon lines where there can be no water competition in order to recoup their losses. The public is entitled to the cheapest form of transportation available. If our railroads will quit wasting money along our rivers and between our water points, they will be able to give our people who are away from our rivers a reasonable rate and still earn a profit.

The thing in which we are interested in this country is a means of carrying our commerce. If our resources are to develop so that our national obligations can be met, then we must develop a great system of transportation, consisting of railways, waterways, and highways, each serving the public as economically as it can afford, not competing but coordinated with each other in one harmonious transportation system.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, this great question of transportation in the United States is one that has never yet apparently invited the real solemn attention of the American people.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I think you are absolutely right.

Mr. LAYTON. We are spending large sums of money on rivers and harbors, and every dollar that we spend on rivers and harbors, as a rule, is in competition with the railroads, and then we have an Interstate Commerce Commission, with labor boards and everything of that kind, and we are taking the railroads over and handling them by law, and every instrumentality of transportation is running against every other. There is no coordination in any direction. In addition to that we are spending millions of dollars for public highways, which always enter into competition with both waterways and railroads.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. We are not interested in railroads, we are not interested in waterways, we are not interested in highways. But the thing in which the American people are interested is adequate and economical facilities for transportation. [Applause.]

The War Department, through the direction of Col. T. Q. Asburn, of its department of transportation, and Theodore Brent, the barge-line director, is making a demonstration upon the Mississippi River between St. Louis and New Orleans which is proving, in the face of tremendous obstacles, that river navigation is not only practicable but that it can be made a powerful instrument in the commercial development of the country. The barge line is carrying freight at 80 per cent of the rail rates which parallels the river, and the rail lines which parallel the river are permitted to make rates which amount to little more than 50 per cent of the average rail rates of the country; and in addition to this severe competition the barge line is handicapped by the unfair and unreasonable division of joint rail and water rates which I have just described. And yet the Mississippi Barge Line, in the face of all these difficulties, is operating at a profit.

The barge line began its operation on the 1st of January last year, and with 1 new towboat and 39 barges, most of which were inactive for a time for want of power to move them. In June 2 new towboats were added to the fleet and 1 old stern-wheel towboat, the Barrett, was rebuilt and put into service. Then 2 additional towboats were completed and put into service in November, making a total of 6 towboats, aided by three or four old inferior tugs, and this fleet is still in operation between New Orleans and St. Louis, and in order that you may understand the extent and success of that operation I will give you the tonnage, the gross expenses, the gross revenue, and the revenue, and the results.

SUMMARY.

Total tonnage, 563,211.
Gross revenue	$2,164,270.09
Gross expenses	1,559,423.72
Profit	204,463.37

It is interesting to note that within a period of 14 months, with this limited equipment in its experimental state, operating under conditions which I have described, the barge line collected a total revenue of $2,164,270.09. Operating, as it did, at 80 per cent of the rail rate which paralleled the river, this 20 per cent differential has resulted in a saving to the shippers who patronize the barge line amounting to $541,134. It is also interesting to note that in spite of the obstacles encountered by the barge line during the first 14 months of its operation, its receipts exceed its total expenditure in the sum of $204,463.37.

The barge-line equipment was built under war conditions at a war-time cost in excess of $9,000,000. That equipment has been recently appraised, and it is found that the same equipment could be constructed to-day at a cost of approximately $4,000,000.

Experienced rivermen tell me that there are barges and other equipment inferior to this which have been in use upon the Mississippi River for more than 40 years. There is no reason to believe that this equipment, under proper care, would not last equally long. This would mean a depreciation of 2½ per cent, amounting to $100,000 per year. It will be observed from the figures which I have given that the barge-line profit during the last 12 months amounted to $245,905.60. After setting aside $100,000 of the total profit earned as depreciation, there is enough left to yield 3.6 per cent income upon $4,000,000, the present reconstruction cost of the equipment. Even though the rail lines on an average collect 50 per cent more for the services rendered than the barge line, yet how many railroads are there in this country who can boast of a better showing during the past 12 months?

It has been reported that while the barge line earned a profit last year it did not earn enough to pay its depreciation, but this is due to the fact that the barge line was required by a rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission to set aside for depreciation a sum equal to 5 per cent of the book value of the equipment, amounting to more than $9,000,000, and the 5 per cent was fixed on the theory that the equipment will be worn out in 20 years. A fair depreciation would be 2½ per cent upon the cost of constructing the same equipment to-day.

The barge line made a profit of $245,905.60 during the year in spite of the fact that during the months of September, October, and November, 1921, there was a loss of $72,674.29. This is due to the fact that great quantities of wheat were moving from Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and western Missouri and adjoining States over the barge line during these months, and the Interstate Commerce Commission had reduced the freight rate upon wheat from 19 to 14 cents per 100 pounds, and, inasmuch as the 20 per cent differential made the barge line attractive to the shipper, great quantities of this wheat went over the barge line with much profit to the shipper but with considerable loss to the barge line. The railroads, however, fared only 20 per cent better than the barge line upon wheat which they carried. As a matter of fact, when unjust discriminations are eliminated and a fair division of freight is compelled on a joint rail and water haul, States like Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and South Dakota will profit as much from cheap water transportation on the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers as the farmer and the merchant who resides upon or near the bank of the river.

In order to ascertain the character of freight which is being carried upon the Mississippi barge line and in order to learn its origin and destination I procured from that line a list of the freight which went down the Mississippi in one cargo last November. It would take too much time to give the entire list of freight carried in that cargo, but I will give you a few of the items, together with the point of origin and point of destination of each item:

Criticism is sometimes made of the fact that the Government is engaged in the operation of a transportation system, and no one believes in private operation more than I, but as a result of the war we have millions invested in waterway equipment, and if we do not want Government operation of our waterways we must find a status, a legal status, by which private capital in river operations can be made safe, and in the face of the discriminations and unfair division of rates, which I have described, it is evident that that status does not exist to-day. Who would be willing to purchase the barge-line equipment on the Mississippi and subject himself to the cutthroat competition and unfair division of rates which the Interstate Commerce Commission permits the railroads to practice?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman is on that subject, let me ask him a question. That barge line is a feature of the war, primarily?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There is practically no transportation on the Mississippi River to-day except that barge line?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. There has been quite a good deal developing recently.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. How can you with success develop transportation on the Mississippi River by private enterprise so long as this system of discriminatory rates exists?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I will say frankly to the gentleman that if the discriminatory rail rates, which I am pointing out, and the unfair division of freight collected upon joint rail and water rates are continued and some legislation is not passed by Congress to correct these abuses, there is little hope of any considerable water transportation being developed by private capital.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, could the Interstate Commerce Commission correct these abuses now, taking into consideration the operation of the railroads, with your labor boards and your wage boards and all that?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; they could.

Mr. LAYTON. I do not think they can.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If this Congress will enact legislation which will make it mandatory for the Interstate Commerce Commission to prevent these abuses and to treat waterway transportation with the same consideration which it gives to transportation by rail, our equipment can be sold to private capital at a tremendous advantage and cheap water transportation will develop upon our inland rivers which will stimulate the industries of the country and will benefit the railroads as well.

There may have been some excuse in years past for neglecting our rivers and depending upon our railways, because our railways were able then to meet the demands of commerce and their rates were not unduly high. But conditions are changed now. There has not been a railroad of any consequence constructed in this country in 15 years, and I have not seen capital looking for railroad investment. As soon as business opens up in earnest again the railroads will be totally inadequate to meet the demands of commerce. Furthermore, their rates are high, and when we consider the cost of railroad operation I am convinced that these rates may have to go higher still. I know of no better authority for the inability of the railroads to reduce rates or to meet the demands of commerce than statements made by officials of the railroads.

I am advised that Vice President McCrea, of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., before the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce on February 24, 1922, while discussing this subject, made a statement which contained the following:

> In the United States during the 12 months ended December, 1921, but 400 miles of new line were built, while 700 miles have been abandoned. Practically no railroads have built double track, increased their yard facilities, or taken steps to relieve congested points where they have had much of their trouble in the past few years and know they will have more trouble in the future. We have had no money for this; every dollar available and all of our energies have of necessity been expended in restoring our existing facilities to a safe and efficient operating condition.

I am also advised that Vice President Elisha Lee, of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., in a speech recently before the Manufacturers Association of Philadelphia made a statement which, among other things, contained the following:

> Traffic on our American railroads measured in ton-miles doubles about once in a decade or possibly a little longer. The next time our country has a real revival in business we shall in all probability be confronted with the most severe congestion of railroad traffic and the greatest inadequacy of railroad facilities ever experienced in our history.
>
> When that happens rates will be lost sight of. Everyone will be clamoring for service, and our public highways will again be torn to pieces by huge truck loads of freight carried over roadways never designed for such purposes, and at rates and costs of operation so high as to constitute gross economic waste.
> Then business men will not be bothering themselves much about rates. All they will be thinking about will be how to get transportation at any price.

In the face of these gloomy forebodings proclaimed by high railroad officials; in the face of their admissions that when business conditions improve they will not be able to meet the demands of commerce; in the face of their promise of still higher rates and with our knowledge that their predictions are well founded, how can any Member justify himself in failing to support adequate appropriations for the improvement of our waterways so that we may have facilities sufficient for our slow freight at least?

Mr. McDUFFIE. And do not they carry the commerce in shorter time than the railroads?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes. I have received a number of letters from shippers in St. Louis stating that consignments of freight from points in England and Europe brought by ocean steamers to New Orleans and by barge to St. Louis have arrived in a shorter time than shipments by rail from various points in the United States.

The commerce of the country must have a cheaper and more adequate form of transportation for its bulky commodities. And where can you find such transportation except by the use of our waterways? At the close of the World War Kansas had an abundance of wheat. The market was strong and the price high, but cars to move the wheat were not available. Before the railroads could supply the cars to move this wheat the market had gone down until, I am advised, there was a loss to the farmers of Kansas amounting to more than $2,000,000. Unless transportation facilities are increased this thing will occur again. If the Missouri River had been improved a few cars could have hauled this Kansas wheat to Kansas City, where it could have been loaded upon barges and carried to the market while the price was high, and that at a low freight rate. Surely the farmers of Kansas are interested in having this thing made possible.

In order to demonstrate to you the extent to which freight rates in this country have been increased during the past two years, I want to give you a few specific examples. Two years ago the rate on 100 pounds of sugar from New Orleans to St. Louis was 44 cents; to-day it is 59½ cents. Two years ago the rate on 100 pounds of sugar from New Orleans to Camden, Ark., was 50 cents; to-day it is 67½ cents. One year ago the rate on 100 pounds of wire rope from Clinton, Iowa, to Seattle was $1.32; to-day it is $1.50. One year ago the rate on 100 pounds of wire rope from Mount Wolf, Pa., to Seattle was 69 cents; to-day it is $1.83½. And this general increase prevails throughout the country. I am not contending that the railways can afford to make cheaper rates, for I know that it costs about three times as much to construct the necessary equipment and to carry a given amount of freight over a rail line than it does over a water line. What I am contending is that we need a form of transportation which it costs less to produce.

As an illustration of what barge-line transportation means to the farmer, I was told by a St. Louis hay merchant recently that he had been seeking a market for his hay in Cuba, but that he had found that hay produced upon the farms of Canada was being transported from Canadian ports to Havana for $3 less freight per ton than hay could be shipped from St. Louis to the same port. He told me that the corn men of St. Louis were competing in the Cuban market because the barge line, though its space was limited, would take corn at the river rate. Hay from Missouri and Iowa and Kansas could likewise compete in the Cuban market if the barge-line equipment was adequate to give this bulky commodity space and likewise the benefit of its low rate.

I have stated that the barge line was carrying freight at 80 per cent of the rail rate which paralleled the river, and that the rail rate which paralleled the river was little better than 50 per cent of the average rail rate of the country. In proof of this assertion I desire to state that the barge line last year collected 3.86 mills per ton-mile for all the freight which it hauled. In other words, for every ton of merchandise which it carried 1 mile it received for compensation therefor the sum of 3.86 mills. In response to a request which I made upon the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the average revenue per ton-mile which the railroads of the United States received for carrying commerce during the years 1920 and 1921, I received a communication from that commission, dated the 2d instant, in which they informed me that the record for 1921 is not yet compiled, but that their records show that for the year 1920 the railroads of the United States received on an average for all freight carried the sum of 10.52 mills per ton-mile; and the rates were higher in 1921 than they were in 1920. In other words, the service of the barge line costs the shippers only 36 per cent as much as the service of the railroads, and the records further show that of the 10.52 mills which the railroads collected for each ton-mile for freight hauled it required 93.05 per cent of such amount to pay the expenses of operation, but that of the 3.86 mills which the barge line collected for each ton-mile of freight hauled it required only 90 per cent for operating expenses. There can be no question about the economy of water transportation. In the face of these facts, if the primary purpose of Congress is to serve the best interest of the whole people, how can we justify our failure to make appropriations adequate to insure the development of a form of transportation which will cost the people of this country only one-third as much as the form of transportation which they are compelled to use to-day? Whom are we here to serve, the railroads or the public? If it is the railroads, then for their own sake we should bar them from from this foolish and wasteful competition. If it is the public, then we should no longer deprive them of the economy of water transportation. In what are we interested? Is it railroads or is it transportation for American commerce, regardless of form and at the cheapest prices obtainable? In our answer to these questions the public is concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. According to the gentleman's own statement there will be——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for an additional 15 minutes, not to be taken out of the time already allotted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that can not be done.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself particularly to the rivers and harbors item of this bill.

Too much stress can hardly be laid upon the absolute necessity of a thorough and comprehensive program for the development of our inland waterways, those great natural channels of transportation which have for so many years been practically neglected in our economic development. While it is true that millions have been appropriated from time to time for the development of individual projects, the great fault has been that plans completed in all sincerity have not been carried out. Appropriations have been made for the maintenance of a 6-foot channel from St. Paul, the headwaters of the Mississippi, to St. Louis—upon what is known as the upper Mississippi. Expenditures have been made with this purpose in view, but the work has lapsed from time to time, with the result that the 6-foot channel has not been maintained during the period of low water, and consequently navigation has been suspended.

Considering river navigation from a national viewpoint, in conjunction with our plans for developing our merchant marine and increasing our foreign trade, it is absolutely essential that shippers be given as low a through rate as possibly can be fixed upon the bulky commodities that enter into our foreign trade in order to permit American business to compete with our overseas rivals. If we can cut our transportation costs materially in delivering our commodities from the interior to our ports, it means that much more of an advantage to our people in foreign markets. This cost must be kept down to a minimum in order to compete with the constantly increasing productive capacities of foreign countries. Unless our transportation costs upon wheat and other agricultural commodities entering our export trade are decreased, it means the American farmer must bear the burden of decreased prices for his products. By the expenditure of a few millions of dollars in perfecting these lanes of transportation benefits of untold millions will accrue to the producers of our country. Surely this is economy of the most practical nature. We can well afford to accept the expert advice of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army in appropriating $42,815,661, the amount he sets as the absolute minimum required for the improvement and the maintenance of our river and harbor facilities and for the very urgent new projects under contemplation.

In an address made by Vice President McCrea, of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., before the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce on February 24, 1922, he stated:

> What is the real problem we have before us? Should we not anxiously consider the time when industries will be producing 100 per cent and will be demanding double the amount of transportation from the railways? Do you appreciate that the railways of this country are standing still, as far as expansion to meet these inevitable conditions of the future?

This statement, coming from one of the responsible heads of one of our great railway systems, clearly indicates the condition of our transportation facilities at the present time. Further on in his address Mr. McCrea pointed out that our railroads are doing nothing to meet the anticipated requirements of the near future when American business again returns to its normal capacity, nor to meet the increased output of our factories and farms as a result of the increasing demand due to the development of our foreign trade. There is a solution to this most perplexing problem. The railroads can and must be relieved of the responsibility of this added service. It can very conveniently and very practicably be handled upon our inland waterways at an economic saving of millions of dollars to our producers. Our foreign competitors have the full use and benefit of both rail and water transportation, while we are practically confined to the use of but one form of transportation which has become entirely inadequate to meet the needs of our growing commerce. The only possible means of relief is water transportation. What are you going to do about it? Are you going to make sufficient appropriations for the proper development of our waterways, or are you going to allow our railroad facilities to suffer another total collapse such as we experienced during the recent war, as they surely will under the stress and strain of the constantly growing mountain of freight that must reach our ports once our output reaches its peak. To stagnate this business once it assumes these proportions will result in irreparable damage to our economic structure. It will create a spirit of depression even more sinister in its forebodings than that following the signing of the armistice. We must take advantage of this opportunity to ward off this danger by approving the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers for the development of our inland waterways. Of course, we all realize that railroad transportation is an absolute necessity. We could not exist without this system of transportation. But the point I desire to bring out forcibly is that our inland waterways are just as essential to the economic development of our country as are the railroads. In order to utilize our railroads to the utmost and increase their practicabiltiy and efficiency we must develop our waterways. Our railroads have reached the limit of their capacity for rendering satisfactory service. This thought is expressed generally by men primarily engaged in railroad activities. No one knows better than they the seriousness of the situation confronting us; they admit the railways will be in no position to handle the constantly growing commerce of the country, and yet some of their leaders openly and stubbornly antagonize all efforts tending to effect a utilization of the only other means of transportation which can effectively preclude the disaster which imminently hovers over them.

The practicability of transportation upon the Mississippi River is no longer doubted. The success of the service maintained between St. Louis and New Orleans has set at rest any fears of the failure of this method of transportation. To extend this service successfully upon the upper Mississippi is a very simple procedure. The barges and the motive power for the maintenance of such service has already been provided. The Government has recently completed the construction of a fleet of up-to-date barges and power boats, which are ready to operate on the river. The only drawback at this time is the lack of appropriations to put the channel in such shape as to insure a 6-foot waterway for the entire season. Once the municipalities along the river are assured of regular service very little time will be lost in building adequate dockage facilities to handle their local freight. The Government should assist municipalities along the river in the construction of docks and providing facilities for handling all foreign freight—that is, through freight from inland points to down-river points, and vice versa—for this burden should not fall entirely upon the local people; it is a national requirement and should be financed by the people as a whole. Under an amendment to the transportation act the Secretary of War was authorized to construct terminal facilities for interchange of traffic between the transportation facilities operated by him and other carriers. The War Department is now operating facilities on the lower Mississippi and on the Warrior River from Mobile to Birmingham, Ala. The authority for the construction of such terminal facilities and their maintenance should be extended to include those required along all our navigable inland waterways wherever they are utilized for the transshipment of commodities. Congress is responsible in a large measure for the success or failure of our transportation systems in an emergency. It has the power now to avert a repetition of the serious breakdown that occurred during the war. It has the opportunity to assist in the development to the fullest extent of our merchant marine and our foreign commerce, which directly concerns our people as a whole. This is a national problem and must be considered as such and not as a community or local matter. The amendment to increase the item of $27,635,260 for rivers and harbors to the amount suggested by the Chief of Engineers of the War Department—$42,815,661—should be adopted.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to yield time?

Mr. SISSON. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, this is designated as the Army appropriation bill, before the House for consideration, but the speeches have taken a broad range and have gone far afield from this immediate subject under discussion. One gentleman discussed railroad rates and fertilizers. Another discussed rivers and harbors, another discussed the bonus, and it occurs to me that they have failed to reach the fundamentals of what is the matter. My friend discussing the fertilizer business and railroad rates surely ought to see that they can not have any cheaper fertilizer under present conditions and that you can not have cheaper railroad rates under existing conditions as are safeguarded around the famous Esch-Cummins railroad bill. When the Congress of the United States guaranteed to the railroads in the United States, after allowing them to pad their expense accounts and pyramid all types of expenses, and make 6 per cent clean profit, how do you expect the railroad rates to come down? Every man who is cognizant of conditions throughout this country, from the Canadian line to the Gulf of Mexico and from the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic, must see that railroad rates are taking too much toll from all lines of industry. And let me say that any man who is a friend of the wealth producers of the United States is bound to admit that in the last analysis they are paying these exorbitant freight rates. In the last analysis these same people are paying these exorbitant fertilizer prices. What brought that about? The Republican majority of this House rammed through that Esch-Cummins bill that fastened these railroad rates on this country that will hang like a millstone around the neck of every honest wealth producer and wage earner in it. The farmers of the United States are paying seven-tenths of all the charges on freight of these railroads to-day. The statistics from your Government show that he paid that outrageous toll for freight on all the produce from the ground that he ships; that all of his truck, wheat, corn, potatoes, cotton, and wool, all of his live stock, must finally go to the manufacturer or to the consumer, and the charge for the freight is fixed in the sales price, and the farmer must bear that high freight rate that goes to make up their transportation charge on what he produces.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I will yield.

Mr. HUDSPETH. It costs just exactly half you get for beef steers shipped from Texas to Kansas City. What is responsible for that, the freight rate?

Mr. QUIN. It is the infamous Esch-Cummins railroad bill. When a Republican Congress guaranteed to them a profit of 6 per cent on all of their watered stocks and bonds, on all of their padded pay rolls, and unwarranted expense accounts, how do you expect, my friends, for the farmer and wage earner of this country to get a square deal? How do you expect the man out on the farm to prosper who must buy farm implements, who must buy clothing for his family, who must buy wagons, must buy tractors and fertilizers and other implements to carry on the occupation of a farmer?

He must pay that same exorbitant freight rate on those things that he consumes from the factory or distributing point down to the railroad station where he goes in to take them out to his farm. Do you not see that they rob him coming and going? There is a reason why all the outrageous toll comes out of the pockets of these men back on the farms, and some newspapers and some people in high station have the gall to criticize men in the Senate and in the House of Representatives because we have the manhood and the courage to endeavor to have some relief given to these farmers of the United States who constitute the backbone of the population of this Republic. And if this Republic is to be saved from all the dangers that stare it in the face it must be saved by the people back in the rural districts, these people who produce from the earth the food and the clothing that the folks of the country must consume.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. In 1920 the railroads of the country collected from the people of the United States——

Mr. QUIN. Talk fast. I have only 20 minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. QUIN. Just a short question. I have not much time. I want to make a speech here. [Laughter.] In 1920 the railroads were robbing the people, and by the help of the Republican Party and a few Democrats they have been allowed to continue that thievery and robbery into the year 1922. One gentleman said that the United States was not able to pay the soldiers a bonus.

That same Republican Congress that put across this iniquitous railroad bill, to allow the transportation companies to press down upon the wealth producers, wage earners, in fact all laboring people, and every legitimate industry of the United States, and take away from them half of their earnings in railroad rates, did some other things. They placed an additional burden on the people. They allowed all of these contractors to come in and filch this Government out of $2,000,000,000, and the gentleman from California, my good friend Mr. LINEBERGER, said that they could not pay a bonus unless they do it by the sales tax, which would make the soldier himself pay his own bonus. They are going to enact a sales tax and let the poor people of the United States pay the bonus. Has it come to pass that this administration and a set of Congressmen and Senators would vote to give the railroads $2,000,000,000, and paid all these war-profiteering contractors that rode during the war in their fine limousines and with silk hats on their heads $2,000,000,000, and refuse to give after the war is over a bonus to these soldiers who went back home after the war was over, but before going to their families they had to get rid of the camp lice by having all their Army clothing run through a delousing machine? And yet some rich people in the United States cry out to-day, "Do not allow the boys a nickel; they were taken better care of than at any other time in their lives; they got plenty to eat, and a good suit of clothes, and can work." These same wealthy people were back home profiteering while those boys were standing deep in the mud of the trenches, ready to be shot at from German machine guns, cannon, rifles, and poisonous gas, receiving $1 a day. One dollar and twenty-five cents per day is all that the American Legion asks Congress to pay as a bonus. Just $1.25 a day for the actual time the soldier was in the service. Is that too much compensation? And yet they will allow a railroad president $100,000 a year salary. By conscription you forced the soldier into the service to fight for his country, whether he wanted to or not, and now this country can not allow him to have the paltry sum of $1.25 a day as bonus compensation, a just compensation at that, from this great Government of ours, except as the President said, and as the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER] said, it is proposed he shall pay it himself through the route of the sales tax. Who in the world would consider that anything except an insult to every soldier of the United States, that he can only have a bonus provided he and his kinsfolk pay it? [Applause.] These people who profiteered during the war and are profiteering now, and are putting their hands down into the pockets of the people, are to go free and not help to pay these soldiers any bonus.

Another thing, the President of the United States, whom my friend Mr. LINEBERGER praises so highly, came before this Congress and asked it to aid and give further assistance to the rich. It seems that his policy is to give unto them that hath and take away from them that hath not, even that which they seemeth to have. [Laughter.] He proposed a ship subsidy bill to this House. The profiteers robbed the people in the construction of those ships of many hundreds of millions of dollars, and now the President proposes to let that same gang take them back at 30 cents on the dollar, and give them out of the Treasury of the United States $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 a year, compelling these same farmers, these same wealth producers, wage earners and laborers, and small business people of the Nation, not only to take care of these railroad freebooters, but to come up and take out of their pockets sufficient money to enrich the gentlemen who will take over the Government's fine merchant marine for nothing. Will Congress bow down to any such thing as that? And yet the gentleman from California says the Government can not give the soldiers a bonus unless they make the soldier himself pay it by sales taxes.

Now, what else have they done? They have proposed to allow the biggest Army here four years after the war is over that was ever heard of in the United States in peace times. War is over; the country is at peace. President Harding did a fine thing to call the nations of the earth together in a peace conference here, and they did a lot of good. They propose to take off a great part of this burden of the Navy, and I had hoped that this Congress, acting upon the request of the President of the United States, would reduce the size of the Army down to 50,000.

Yet that same President is alleged to have given out an interview on the day after I told Gen. Pershing before our committee that we ought to pass a bill limiting the Army to not over 75,000, and in that interview the President said the Army must not be reduced; if so, but very little; that he would rather have it stay as it is. Do you believe that those farmers that are paying seven-tenths of all these freight rates, and who are going to have to pay exorbitant rates on all the freight that goes on the ocean vessels after the Government practically gives its ships to a smooth set of business men, and in addition $50,000,000 yearly as a subsidy, and with all other laboring people will have to pay 70 per cent of all the $50,000,000 a year that the President proposes to pay out as a subsidy to the shipowners, are not going to have to pay the greater part of this immense Army bill?

The committee did its best, I think, to bring in a report recommending an appropriation for 115,000 men; but they want 11,000 officers. I am ashamed to say it, but when the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I am a member, reported out the bill, against my vote, to have officers up to the number of 13,000, Gen. Pershing, Chief of Staff, said he would need as many officers for an Army of 75,000 as for one of 150,000. [Laughter.] If a man had a few hands working for him—say 25 hands—according to Gen. Pershing's reasoning he would need as many foremen as he would if he had 50 hands or 100 hands. Gen. Pershing said he did not want a single general knocked off. You know there are 67 generals, and each of them gets as much as the combined income of 15 or 25 farmers. He did not want a single general displaced, no matter how much the Army was reduced.

Here is an Army recommended in this bill of 115,000 men. In my judgment, in peace times it is 65,000 more men than we ought to have. Fifty thousand enlisted men in the Regular Army and a strong National Guard is all we need. It ought to be reduced anyhow to 75,000 men. With all the foreign countries bankrupt, the United States is the only Nation that is able to pay its debts, and those other countries, which owe us so much money, are using our money to pay a bonus to their former soldiers. That bonus is coming out of the pockets of the people of the United States, and yet some folks are sitting here now bellowing for a big Army when every nation in the world is broke except the United States. [Applause.]

What do we want this big Army for? Do you believe that the wealth producers, wage earners, small business people, and professional men of the United States want such an Army as that? Do they want to have a soldier strapped on the back of each one of them when they are already humpbacked with bearing taxes of every kind—road taxes, and school taxes, and municipal taxes, and State taxes, and Federal taxes—and then have the Federal Government come in, slapping them in the face and pushing them down and putting soldiers on their backs? Do you believe there is a small business man or laboring man or woman or a farmer in this great Republic who wants such a big Army as this? [Applause.] Certainly none of them want 11,000 or 13,000 officers. If we are going to have an Army to go out and fight, they have already shown how we can get there. But we are not fixing to fight anybody. Before our committee those officers sat up with a straight face and talked as if we were going to war next week. [Laughter.] Ah, gentlemen, these gentlemen always told us before we got into war that it would take two years to train a soldier. Their faces would be as long as affidavits [laughter] when they told the committee it would take two years to teach young men how to march and drill and fight the enemy. But that fiction has been done away with. This war has demonstrated that we can train a man to fight, and fight effectively, in three months' time.

But that is the kind of rot that they used to hand out. Now that that is done away with it seems they want to destroy the National Guard. It seems that the National Guard must be supplied with a flying squadron and with a tank squadron and a balloon squadron and a chemical-warfare squadron, and every other kind of expense. Of course, the States can not maintain that kind of a National Guard. There is only one kind of army that is any way cheap, and that is the National Guard. Every State in this Union ought to have a strong National Guard of infantrymen, and the Federal Government ought to pay its part of it. [Applause.]

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 17, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 16, 1922.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of papers and documents on the files of the Treasury Department which are not needed in the transaction of business and having no permanent value or historic interest, and asking for action looking to their disposition, which was referred to a joint select committee on the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments. The Vice President appointed Mr. STERLING and Mr. MCKELLAR members of the committee on the part of the Senate and ordered that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, several days ago I called the attention of the Senate to a statement issued by the head of the American Legion showing that there are several million men out of work in the United States, 700,000 of whom are ex-service men, and protesting against the number of immigrants continually coming into the country to increase the number of idle people. He urged the President to help provide work for these unemployed ex-service men. I am not saying this in criticism. I am simply calling the attention of the Senate to the alarming condition brought about by the millions of unemployed in our country, which is being increased by the large number of immigrants constantly brought to our shores. If Congress had not passed the 3 per cent law last year we would have had one or two million more unemployed here now. I favored at the time this legislation was enacted and think now we ought to stop all immigration for five years, except in certain extreme cases of the same family, some of whom are already here and a number of whom served in our Army during the late war.

I have a letter now from the head of the American Federation of Labor, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD. I hope that the Senate Committee on Immigration will change the recent bill which passed the House and take steps to stop practically all immigration. The House bill simply extends for one year the 3 per cent law Congress enacted last year. If the Senate concurs in the House bill the 3 per cent law will expire June 30, 1923. Unless Congress is called in extra session at that time there will be no law restricting immigration, and the steamship companies, interested only in the profits they make in bringing the immigrants here, will use extra ships and bring in two or three millions more before Congress can pass a law preventing it. The regular session of Congress will convene in December, 1923. If one House of Congress should pass a bill restricting immigration the opposition in the other House might be able to delay action, which would give the steamship companies another year, in which they would bring in three or four million more immigrants to add to our already several million unemployed. If the Senate will not stop immigration entirely, as I believe should be done, it seems to me absolutely necessary that we should extend the present 3 per cent law until June 30, 1924, instead of 1923, as provided in the House bill. The letter from the head of the American Federation of Labor protesting against the House bill is exactly in line with that of the head of the American Legion. I have again offered an amendment that will prevent immigration for five years; also an amendment requiring that all immigrants be brought to this country in our own ships, and our agents could then prevent the undesirable ones from coming over and being sent back to their own country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., March 16, 1922.

Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS,
Senate Committee on Immigration, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In the name of the workers and the would-be workers now unemployed we protest against the adoption of H. J. Res. No. 268, as passed by the House of Representatives.

At the hearings before the House committee the representatives of the American Federation of Labor urged that immigration be restricted, except for the dependent immediate relatives of aliens now here who have established themselves and are able to support such dependent relatives, on the ground that every effective immigrant admitted under present industrial conditions must result in throwing out of employment a worker now in our country. We repeat that assertion; we point to the millions of workers walking the streets of our cities and industrial towns or tramping the roads because they can find no employment. We hold that to admit more potential workers at this time is an injustice not only to those now here but to those aliens who might be admitted.

The resolution adopted by the House of Representatives provides for the consideration of the present 3 per cent limitation law until June 30, 1923.

While we recognize the fact that under this law upward of 200,000 immigrants, most of them potential workers, have been admitted between June, 1921, and the end of that year, we also recognize that without the limitations provided in that law there would have arrived here nearly 1,000,000 immigrants in the period mentioned. At the time the 3 per cent limitation law was under consideration immigrants were arriving at the rate of 100,000 per month, and only the fact that shipping accommodations were limited prevented the incoming of a far greater number. We have no doubt but that if the limitation law had not been adopted the capacity of shipping would have increased to accommodate the full demand.

We therefore wish to point to the fact that only the "short session," December to March 4, intervenes between the present session and the time set for the expiration of the limitation law, and if the law expires and no other legislation is adopted in the short session the bars will be down and we can expect immigrants by the hundreds of thousands each month.

We ask, first, for restriction of immigration to the immediate dependent relatives of foreigners now here.

Or, second, that the present 3 per cent limitation law shall be the law until further action of the Congress of the United States.

Or, third, that the present limitation law shall continue in force until June 30, 1924, thus safeguarding the country from a flood of immigration, until Congress shall have opportunity to adopt permanent legislation dealing with this problem.

Respectfully, yours,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two.

Resolutions memorializing Congress in favor of the passage of Federal law to further regulate the use of narcotic drugs.

Whereas the number of drug addicts in the United States has abnormally increased to such an extent as to become a serious menace to the health and welfare of the citizens of this country; and

Whereas the importation of opium and coca leaves and their derivatives has increased beyond necessary proper medical requirements, and a great proportion of such importations are illegally sold and distributed throughout the country, due to the lack of sufficiently drastic Federal legislation; and

Whereas under the present Federal law it is impossible for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, without further assistance from the Federal Government, to effectively curb the illicit drug traffic existing within its confines; and

Whereas the lack of cooperation between the Federal Government and the States and the absence of proper and effective legislation throughout the country has made possible the abnormal growth of the illicit drug traffic: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts urgently request Congress to pass such legislation as will provide for proper and effective Federal regulation of the importation of narcotic drugs and of the sale and distribution thereof, to the end that sufficient quantity thereof may be available only for proper, legitimate medical purposes through the establishment of properly regulated Federal distributing agencies; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

In house of representatives, adopted, March 3, 1922.

In senate, adopted, in concurrence, March 8, 1922.

A true copy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

AMERICAN TROOPS ON THE RHINE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, under date of March 13 I find a dispatch in the New York Times which begins as follows:

It is the opinion of Premier Poincare, who, like Secretary Hughes, is known as an able lawyer, that the United States has no legal rights upon which to base its claim for the payment of $251,000,000 for army of occupation costs out of the sums which Germany has paid to the Reparations Commission.

The way in which the French premier views the situation from a legal point of view may be reduced to the following formula of logic:

Major premise—Just as America is not bound by the Versailles treaty terms, so the Allies are not bound by the terms of the Berlin treaty.

Minor premise—America's claim is based on the Berlin treaty.

Conclusion—The Allies are not bound to grant America's claim.

It is furthermore known to be the premier's attitude that as matters stand Germany has no right to pay America directly without the consent of the Reparations Commission, because the treaty of Versailles gives the Allies a first mortgage on all German resources, including German property sequestered in the United States.

Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the proposition of securing the $251,000,000 at this time. This dispatch says—and with that I agree—Mr. Hughes is a very great lawyer, and I have no doubt that out of the intricacies arising by reason of the Versailles treaty and the Berlin treaty he will evolve some method and mode of securing the $251,000,000. I have no doubt that it will engage his utmost ability as a lawyer to do so. However, it is not my purpose to discuss that.

Our Army was left in Europe supposedly for the benefit of the Allies. It was not, certainly not, left upon the Rhine for the benefit of the people of the United States, directly or particularly. It was supposed to be there for the purpose of giving poise, as it were, to the situation and as an influence for good and possibly steadying what might be otherwise confusion between those who were more immediately connected with affairs in Europe than our people and our Army. If the American Army is no longer desired in Europe—and this would indicate it is no longer desired—upon what possible theory is it kept in Europe?

It seems to me that the attitude of the Allies with reference to this entire matter, if for no other reason—and there are plenty of other very good reasons—warrants us in bringing all these soldiers home. The time has now come, Mr. President, when it is apparent that their presence there is calculated to irritate the situation rather than to work for the benefit, as it was supposed, of the Allies. I trust, therefore, that our entire attention will not be devoted to securing the $251,000,000 to the exclusion of considering the wisdom of bringing the soldiers home and relieving the situation of our presence there entirely.

There is another reason why they should be brought home. I think one of the unjust things connected with the actions of the allied and associated powers since the armistice is that of maintaining so large a body of men upon the Rhine. They are maintained at the expense of the German Government, as they should be, if it were necessary to maintain them at all, but there is no justification, and never has been, for maintaining anything like the large body of armed forces upon the Rhine that have been maintained there. All these things are calculated to retard the recovery of Germany economically, and the recovery thereby of Europe economically, a thing in which the whole world is very greatly interested.

I observe this morning in the press dispatches from St. Augustine that the Secretary of War is buckling on his armor to fight Congress against the reduction of the Army. Well, Mr. President, if the American Army is not needed in Europe, certainly to that extent the troops should be brought home, and to that extent the reduction of the Army of the United States might very well be justified. There can be no justification for maintaining an Army there if the Allies think that they are unnecessary, and certainly it would assist us in reducing the size of the Army of the United States and to do so without working any detriment to the security of the people of the United States.

However, what I rose to say—and I can say it in a sentence in conclusion—is that there is no longer any justification for maintaining a single American soldier upon European soil. They should all be brought home. It would have been the wiser course to have brought them home long ago, but to keep them there now will justify severe criticism.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is the Senator from Idaho advised as to how many soldiers are there now?

Mr. BORAH. No; I can not tell just how many are yet there.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My information is that only 2,500 troops are left there, and that the policy of the administration is to bring them home just as rapidly as the regular transportation facilities will enable that to be done.

Mr. BORAH. I observe in the press dispatches from St. Augustine this morning that the administration are going to bring all of the soldiers home except 2,000. I assume, therefore, that they are going to leave 2,000 there. I do not know whether that is a correct statement, but I have no doubt that the contents of the press dispatch were known before the dispatch was sent. However, 2,000 soldiers upon the Rhine, as the situation now develops, would be just as unfortunate, in my judgment, as 4,000. The idea of leaving 2,000 soldiers there must be, as I said a moment ago, merely in the nature of an element of poise in the situation, but now that Poincare and representatives of the other allied powers seem to think that they are no longer necessary, as their action discloses, I do not see why they should not all be brought home.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Idaho allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say a few words in favor of the American soldiers. The American soldiers have been retained on the Rhine, and are still being retained there, because, of all the soldiers who fought in the Great War against Germany, the American soldiers are the most popular. In the first place, their pay is greatly in excess of that which the troops of other countries receive, and they are liberal spenders. Then, too, frequently they marry German women. The Germans much prefer to have the American soldiers than to have either the French or the English. I desire to say that much in favor of the American soldier.

Wherever the American soldier goes he is preferred to the soldier of any other country, because he is, first of all, a gentleman; and, in the next place, he is well supplied with money and patronizes the local interests in the expenditure of his money. He courts the native girls and often marries them and brings them back to America to make of them good citizens.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have heard something about the American soldier and the German girl. I did not intend to discuss that matter, but I think what the Senator from Minnesota states is a very high recommendation both for the American soldier and the German girl. I do not suppose, however, that what the Senator states is really the reason why we are keeping the American soldiers on the Rhine.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to state further to the Senator from Idaho, if he will allow me, that from the last report which I noticed there are two places in particular where the American soldiers have been stationed. One is Coblenz and the other is Ehrenbreitstein, where great fortifications are located on the Rhine. Both are in the wine country; and there the Germans like to keep the American soldiers. The Germans have fairly fallen in love with them, and they dislike very much to have them leave. It is a great help to the Germans to have the American dollar circulated there instead of the depreciated German mark.

Mr. BORAH. I think there is a great deal in what the Senator says, but what he states has not been the reason thus far assigned by the administration for keeping the soldiers on the Rhine. If that is the reason, of course, we must approach this argument from a different standpoint. There are a great many interesting matters which might be disclosed with reference to that feature of the question. However, Mr. President, I did not desire to do other than call attention to this matter this morning, but it will be a very live issue when the appropriation bill with reference to the Army reaches the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. He is always very clear and speaks to the point. Possibly, however, if the Senator from Idaho some years ago had agreed with my viewpoint with reference to the European situation some of the present complications would not have arisen, for, undoubtedly, if we had ratified the treaty of Versailles these settlements would have been made some time ago.

Mr. BORAH. Had we done so, we should have had many thousand troops in Europe by this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At least we should have had some reason for keeping them there.

Mr. BORAH. There would have been no good reason in the world for doing so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the treaty of Versailles was not ratified; there is no disturbing condition so far as America is concerned, and I can see no reason now why a single American soldier should remain on the Rhine. I think the place for them is at home. I agree with what the Senator has said in that regard, and I hope that at an early date they will be brought back. In justice to the War Department, however, let me say that my understanding is that they are bringing the soldiers home in American transports, and possibly saving money in returning them in that way, but there is a limited space on the transports, and it takes some little time to bring all of them back.

As to the other point, we were invited by the supreme council, which did not grow out of the treaty of Versailles but grew out of the war, and by our allies to maintain a certain number of troops on the border line at the Rhine, and although technically M. Poincare, the French premier, may be right, in justice and fair play, the American Government is entitled to stand on the same basis as the other allied Governments and to receive from Germany its proportion of reimbursement for the soldiers it has maintained on the Rhine, just as the other Governments are to receive reimbursement for maintaining their soldiers. I regret very much that our allies in the late war are determined to stand on a technicality and to refuse to allow our soldiers who have done their part of the service in protecting the border on the Rhine to receive from Germany compensation for that service in proportion to what is paid to France and England.

However, Mr. President, while I am not going back and thresh out the Versailles treaty, for that is now water that has gone over the mill, there is a matter which may not be said to be water that has gone over the mill, which, in fact, has been retained in the dam by the action of the majority party and the present administration. I refer to the Reparation Commission, which is the matter about which I rose more particularly to speak.

The Reparation Commission is not a part of the League of Nations; it is an organization that grew out of the winding up of the war; and necessarily our Government and our people are not going to be able to settle satisfactorily various difficulties, such as the payment for services of troops on the Rhine, unless we send a representative to take a seat on the Reparation Commission.

It is not necessary for the Republican majority to retract what they said in reference to the treaty of Versailles or the League of Nations, for in the treaty of peace which has been concluded with Germany—I might say their own treaty of peace, which has been indorsed by the present administration—it is provided that nothing in that treaty shall prevent us having representation on the Reparation Commission, provided Congress shall authorize the President to make the appointment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Senator to allow me to utter a sentence more. I think the time has come when we should be represented on that commission, and I believe the argument the distinguished Senator from Idaho has just made, pointing out one of the difficulties growing out of our failure to be represented on that commission, although we are entitled to representation, leaves the door wide open for him to offer a resolution authorizing and directing the President of the United States to send a representative of this Government to take his place on the Reparation Commission, to assist in winding up the difficult affairs which are confronting us. I am sure that if such a resolution emanated from the distinguished Senator from Idaho there would be no difficulty in securing its passage.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt it will go through when I do offer it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. If the suggestion which he has just made, that Congress authorize the President to appoint a representative of the United States on the Reparation Commission, were adopted, is it not true that we would then necessarily, as participating in the work of that commission, become involved in the apparently insoluble problem that now confronts Great Britain and France in collecting reparations from Germany, a matter which at present seems to be the source of more economic and political trouble in the world than anything else? What benefit would it be to us; how could we be compensated, in view of the comparatively small interest which we have in those matters, by involving ourselves in that tremendous fundamental world difficulty?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if we want to scuttle and run, of course, we can scuttle and run. This question does not involve the League of Nations or the treaty of Versailles; it is a matter of winding up the Great War. We had our responsibility in the war, and if we are going to occupy our rightful place in the house of nations we must still live up to our responsibility. A part of that responsibility is winding up the war, and the Reparation Commission was appointed to wind up the war.

Of course we have not made the claims against Germany that other nations have. I am not criticizing either the late administration or the present administration for not making such claims. I am perfectly willing for our Government to be generous in such matters; but certain claims, such as the one which the Senator from Idaho has pointed out, are just and proper claims, due our Government; but there is no use of our making complaint about losing $251,000,000 if we intend to scuttle and run.

More than that, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington a question myself. I wanted to wind up the war, and when I could not wind it up in my way I wanted peace, and I voted to wind it up in your way. It was not the way I wanted, but I agreed to vote for your treaty of peace; and when you asked me to vote for your treaty of peace you had in it a provision that this Government could take its seat in the Reparation Commission and perform its duty. I say that if you do not do it there will not only be this embarrassment, but there will be embarrassments for years to come if you do not take the responsibility that is our part in the winding up of this war. Therefore I say that as you put it in your treaty of peace, and you invited me to vote for your treaty of peace with that provision in it, the responsibility is up to you to pass the necessary resolution to allow the President of the United States to appoint a representative to take his seat at this table.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to say a word on that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. This claim, if it may be so called—I should call it our right to be paid this $251,000,000—has nothing to do with the Reparation Commission. That was an agreement made under the armistice, which we signed, and of which we were a member. That made the provision that the United States troops should be paid for by Germany. It stands wholly apart from our treaty of peace, and wholly apart from the treaty of Versailles. It is not a reparation, and the attempt to avoid it now is a mere technicality.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator that it is a mere technicality, and I do not think our late allies should attempt to avoid it; but, nevertheless, it rests in the Reparation Commission. Why do I say that? Because the supreme council—the war council; not the supreme council of the League of Nations, but the supreme war council—was in charge of winding up the war, and we had a representative on that council until after the defeat of the treaty of Versailles, and that supreme council turned over to the Reparation Commission the administration of these funds to be collected from Germany to pay the troops on the Rhine, and they are handling the funds; but if we were sitting in the Reparation Commission to-day they could not deny us our share of this fund.

Mr. LODGE. My point is, if the Senator will allow me, that I deny absolutely the right of the supreme council or anybody else to turn over a claim which rests on the armistice. It is wholly distinct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator. There is no difference between us. Nevertheless, the only way in which we can get it, since they are administering it in that way, is to take our seat at the reparation table.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. In connection with the criticism which the Senator has made of the administration for not authorizing representation——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not criticizing the administration. I am criticizing ourselves, because the administration can not act until we pass the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. In connection, then, with the criticism that this Government has not authorized representation on the Reparation Commission, it may interest the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Idaho, and perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts, to call their attention to an interview published under date of March 15, from Naples, attributed to former Gov. Frank O. Lowden, of Illinois.

In this interview, which I shall ask to have published in the RECORD, the governor is quoted as expressing the opinion that the United States made a very grave mistake when it refused to enter the League of Nations; also that a serious mistake was made when the present administration declined to participate in the Genoa conference. Mr. Lowden is quoted as saying:

I am coming to the conclusion that many American policies may have to be changed. Various ideas and regulations which we regarded as established have been proved to be harmful in the new world which the war created.

I believe that close American contact with Europe is inevitable, and the sooner we produce men capable of mingling advantageously in European conferences the better. It is a matter of education.

Many of our problems would be more easily solved if we were a member of the League of Nations. Reconstruction is a world problem—

Omitting a portion of his statement—

While I have nothing but sympathy for France and understand the French fears, I think a way should be found out of the vicious circle of European hates, which if continued can produce only endless wars—

Omitting again a portion of his statement—

With regard to the Genoa conference I consider that the United States is making a big mistake by not taking part in it.

I thought this interview might intrench somewhat the position of the Senator from Alabama and add interest to the remarks hereafter to be made by the Senator from Idaho. I ask that the entire interview be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LOWDEN SAYS UNITED STATES SHOULD JOIN LEAGUE.

[By Edgar Ansel Mowrer. Special cable to the Atlanta Journal and Chicago Daily News. Copyright, 1922.]

NAPLES, March 15.

Former Gov. Frank O. Lowden, of Illinois, who was a candidate for the Republican nomination for President two years ago, declared on his arrival to-day that the United States made a mistake in not joining the League of Nations, with reservations to the treaty covenant. He also believes America is making another mistake in not taking part in the Genoa economic conference, holding that closer contact with Europe is inevitable.

Mr. Lowden is making a study of conditions at first hand in several European countries while over here with his family visiting two daughters at school in Paris.

"I am coming to the conclusion that many American policies may have to be changed," said Mr. Lowden. "Various ideas and regulations which we regarded as established have proved to be harmful in the new world which the war created.

"I believe that close American contact with Europe is inevitable, and the sooner we produce men capable of mingling advantageously in European conferences the better. It is a matter of education.

"Many of our problems would be more easily solved if we were a member of the League of Nations. Reconstruction is a world problem. While on shipboard I read John M. Keynes's latest book on the revision of the treaty of Versailles. I believe it is the sanest book written on the subject and that the real solution of the reconstruction problem can be found in it.

"While I have nothing but sympathy for France and understand the French fears, I think a way should be found out of the vicious circle of European hates, which if continued can produce only endless wars. The limitation of population is another problem which the world must deal with intelligently. I am an optimist and believe that the situation can be saved, but it needs thought and effort. The key to reconstruction is education, and competent foreign correspondents are the best educators.

"With regard to the Genoa conference, I consider that the United States is making a big mistake by not taking part in it."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it may be that the Government of the United States made a mistake in not entering the League of Nations; but while personally I am very fond of Mr. Lowden, yet if the gentleman from Illinois is correctly quoted I am satisfied of one thing, and that is that the political convention in Chicago did not make any mistake when it refused to nominate him for President. I have observed the effect which these trips over to Europe have upon a good many of these gentlemen. I would prefer that they give their interviews here at home. There is something in the soil, apparently, or the association hard to explain.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there on this question of interviews at home?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a great difference between giving an interview over in Italy and giving one at home. The Senator must not forget that we have the prohibition laws in force here, and they do not over there; and that very often adds a great deal to an after-dinner speech, I have been told.

Mr. BORAH. A trip over there seems to work its results on all men regardless of habits or tastes.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the governor is one of them.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama is perfectly consistent in his position, and has been all the way though. He is working for a certain end, and I think he is accomplishing it day by day; but I call his attention to the fact that we do not need a resolution to have an American member of the Reparation Commission. We have one now. We have a gentleman sitting as a member of the Reparation Commission, and as far as the naked eye can discern there is no difference between his position and that of any other member of the Reparation Commission. He sits, so I am informed, as the others sit in the commission, in the council. He advises, he votes, he counsels, and his judgment is taken, and his vote is taken just the same as that of anyone else. I do not know that I can state that as a fact any further than to say that gentlemen who have been in the presence of the commission, who have seen the commission in action, who have observed its official conduct, state that that is precisely what takes place. I presume that is what takes place, because I read, upon the 15th day of March, from the New York Times, the following:

There was delivered to-day to Roland W. Boyden, the American representative on the Reparation Commission, a reply to the American request for the payment of $251,000,000 * * * which Mr. Boyden transmitted to the finance ministers of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium March 10. The reply of the allied finance ministers states—

And so forth.

For the last several months all the dispatches from Europe have treated Mr. Boyden as an active, full-fledged member of the Reparation Commission; and Mr. James, who writes these articles for the New York Times, is a very accurate journalist—a very accurate reporter, using that term in its broadest sense—and I have no doubt that as Mr. James observes the goings-on of this commission he observes no difference between the position which Mr. Boyden occupies and that which the representatives of Great Britain occupy. So it is not necessary, I will say to the Senator from Alabama, to pass any resolution; and the Senator from Alabama will do the Senator from Idaho the justice to say that in the debate on the German treaty he prophesied that when the treaty was ratified we would take our place upon that commission and conduct ourselves prior to the time of the passage of any resolution by the Congress just the same as if the Congress had passed it. For all intents and purposes we are now a member of the Reparation Commission, just as I had no doubt we would be when we ratified the German treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is undoubtedly correct with reference to his position; and the only objection I have to his reference to our being represented on the Reparation Commission is that we are not represented. If we were represented, we would have a voice. If we had been represented, M. Poincare would not have made the statement he did that the Senator from Idaho read. We have a looker-in, a man in the lookout box, looking into the Reparation Commission, but not a man who is an active part of it; and the Senator is correct. His prophecy that when the German treaty was ratified we would have to go into the Reparation Commission was correct. He made it from the standpoint that he did not think we ought to go in; but he is correct. The inevitable logic of the situation in the end is going to drive this Government to take a seat on the Reparation Commission and to take its part, not in going into the League of Nations, not in being connected with the Versailles treaty, because, as I said, that is water over the dam, but to take its position, its responsibility, in winding up the Great War.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is immaterial whether we now have a representative on the Reparation Commission or whether we should have, as far as the payment for the American soldiers on the Rhine is concerned. I never have been able to understand why we kept any soldiers on the Rhine after the treaty of peace was agreed upon. After the Versailles treaty was agreed upon between our allies and Germany it seemed to me there was no reason why American soldiers should longer be kept in Europe. That was particularly true after we had agreed upon a treaty of peace with Germany. Why we should maintain soldiers on the Rhine is more than I could ever understand, and I never yet have been able to secure from any person what I considered a good reason for that course of action.

Now we are confronted with the fact that these soldiers were kept there, as everybody knew, at the request of our allies, for their benefit, not for ours—there is nothing in it for us—and they were to be paid by Germany; but our allies—Great Britain and Italy and France—have a mortgage on the income of Germany, and we can not be paid, it seems, without their consent.

So they say to us, "Keep your troops here," and they keep their troops there, and to accommodate them, to be friendly with them, to be good to them, we keep our troops there; but when they collect the money from Germany to pay they pay the expenses of their own troops, refuse to pay those of ours, and divide the balance of the swag up among themselves. To my mind, Mr. President, that is treating the American Government with disrespect. It is not fair, it is not honorable, and there have been many times in the history of the world when diplomatic relations have been broken for causes much less than that which exists now.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if they are going to maintain the position which they have assumed, that the expenses of our troops shall not be paid, that they shall be the only troops whose expenses are not paid, until all the other debts of Germany are paid, it will mean that the expenses of the American troops will not be paid——

Mr. BORAH. At all.

Mr. NORRIS (continuing). Until those who are yet young in years will die of old age, and will have forgotten that we ever had any troops on the Rhine. It means no payment.

With that in our faces, with that thrown at us, we are still proposing to keep troops on the Rhine for the accommodation of our allies. It seems to me that one thing ought to be done, and it ought to be done by unanimous consent: Every American soldier on the Rhine should be brought home, and then we should take up in diplomatic channels the question of what further course ought to be pursued as to the payment of the expenses of the soldiers while they have been there.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I regret that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is not here, because he knows all the facts, but I think I am correct in saying that the troops have been coming home steadily for some time. They have come rather slowly, because I think the War Department did not care to go to the expense of employing any but our regular transports and American bottoms in bringing them; but they are coming steadily. I do not know how many are still there, but they are all coming.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope they will all come.

Mr. LODGE. I hope so, too.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the House of Representatives, now considering the military appropriation bill, will provide that none of the funds appropriated shall be used to pay the expenses of American soldiers on the Rhine, making it compulsory and necessary for the administration to bring them all back before the close of the present fiscal year.

Mr. President, when it was proposed by some of us that our Secretary of the Treasury should be instructed to collect the interest due from our allies when they were able to pay it, nobody wanting to crowd them, nobody wanting to be hard on them, or ungenerous, even, the answer which came back will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of about the time I proposed an amendment to the bonus bill when it was before the Senate, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury should collect the past due interest, and use it to pay the soldiers of America the bonus provided in that bill. That created consternation at once, and it was said on the floor of the Senate that nothing could hurt the Government of the United States more than to have that debt paid, because, it was alleged, the great difference in exchange would bring ruin to us if those who owed us paid even the interest on what they owed. I do not agree with that at all. It is now demonstrated that as between Germany and France, Germany and England, and Germany and Italy, that rule does not apply at all. The difference in exchange is about the same between Great Britain and Germany as between Great Britain and America; I do not know but what it is greater; yet Germany is paying reparations to Great Britain, paying reparations to France, and paying reparations to Italy, and, as queer as it may seem, those Englishmen and those Frenchmen and those Italians are glad to get it. But when it comes to paying the interest due to America, it is claimed that it is not a good thing for Americans to receive it.

We have notice now, if our allies continue in the stand they have taken, that we are not to be paid the expenses of the American soldiers in Germany; that the American taxpayer must stand that burden, not for the benefit of America or the United States Government but for the benefit of our allies. If the United States Government permits that to go unchallenged, and submits to that, we will be ready to submit if our allies should say, "We will not pay you anything else, either." If we accept that proposition without objection, and abide by that unjust decree, it would not be half as big a step to say that anything due us, interest, principal, or anything else, shall not be paid, either now or at any time in the future.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope the Senator will not put himself in the position of being so selfish as to insist upon American rights being considered before the rights of other nations. The great heart of a Senator like the Senator from Nebraska certainly ought to be for every other country before he is for his own, if he is to be in harmony with the policy which we have been hearing so much about for the past year.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I regret to say that I have not advanced quite so far yet in my philanthropy and my Christianity; and I do not know of anyone else who has done so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Except the Government of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; as the Senator suggests, unless it is Uncle Sam; but if he has advanced that far, I want to call a halt on him if I can, and get him to muster up some of his courage and demand some of his rights.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, I am quite well aware of the fact that nobody announces that he is in favor of such a proposition, but sometimes actions speak louder than words. I am quite well aware, however, that the Senator from Nebraska really is devoted to his own country above all other countries, which I think is the proper attitude for a man and a statesman to take. In that, of course, I am rather old-fashioned, perhaps reactionary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes consideration of the unfinished business, House bill 9103, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KING. What is the committee amendment? Let it be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert a substitute.

Mr. FLETCHER. I give notice that before the vote is taken on the committee amendment to the pending bill I shall offer an amendment to the proposed substitute, and I shall want to discuss that amendment when it becomes in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose I ought to say a word upon the measure in completion of the discussion that I was indulging in the other day, but I do not want to ask the Senate to listen to this matter until it has finished with the subject which has engaged the Senate for the last half hour, and if there is anyone else who desires to discuss our foreign affairs, I hope he will rise now and ask recognition of the Chair, so that when we do begin upon domestic matters we can consider the questions arising somewhat continuously.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, as I stated privately to the Senator from Iowa, I desire at some time during the day to make some observations on the views advanced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] the other day as to whether or not the four-power treaty is an alliance, but I do not desire at all to intrude at this time. If the Senator desires to go on with his bill, I shall be very glad to wait.

Mr. CUMMINS. As far as I am concerned, any time convenient to the Senator from Ohio will be convenient for me, because we have now fallen into the habit of subordinating the pending bill to every other matter which has been brought to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the very generous invitation of the Senator, I would like to make just one observation, which relates not alone to foreign affairs but to domestic affairs as well.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] called attention to the expenditures in connection with the Army, and stated that when the Army appropriation bill comes before the Senate undoubtedly, if we were to continue our soldiers upon the Rhine, the appropriation for that purpose might be challenged. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to the naval appropriation bill, which will soon be before us, and the apparent purpose of the Secretary of the Navy, regardless of the number of the personnel which may be fixed by Congress for the Navy, to maintain the number of marines at more than 27,000. We have gotten into the habit of stationing marines in various parts of the world where we have no business to have them—in Haiti, in Porto Rico, in Guatemala, and the Lord only knows where else. I hope the committee will not accept the views of the Secretary of the Navy and continue to authorize a marine force of more than 27,000. I suggest to the Senator from Washington that if they report the bill continuing that number they will encounter some hostility to that provision.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator from Utah is mistaken as to the number of marines now in the service of the Government. I do not think the number is 27,000. My impression is that it is 20,000. It used to be 24,000, but in the appropriation act for the present fiscal year the provision was cut down so as to allow for only 20,000.

Mr. KING. I do not have before me the figures which have been recently submitted, I am told, by the Secretary of the Navy with respect to the number of marines. My recollection is that he desires 27,000, plus.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not speaking about what the Secretary of the Navy desires; I am speaking about the actual force we have.

Mr. WILLIS. I have conferred with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and he advises me that he will be perfectly satisfied if I go on with the observations I intend to make relative to a certain phase of the four-power treaty.

Mr. LODGE. If any Senator desires to speak on the treaty, I think it is my duty, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to move that we go into open executive session. We can return immediately, as I hope we shall, to the consideration of the judges bill, but I think under the unanimous-consent agreement I am bound to take that course.

Mr. CUMMINS. I quite agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to that action.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed in open executive session to consider executive business, for the purpose of considering the four-power treaty.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I think the Senate will bear me out in the statement that I have not detained it very often, and certainly not upon this particular question; but the point raised by the remarks of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] day before yesterday seems to me to be of such importance that I want to take a few minutes of the Senate's time to direct especial attention to those remarks, and to what I deem the dangerous effect they are likely to have upon the country.

At page 3911 of the RECORD my friend, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], used the following language:

> As the Senator will find out if he will look into any standard dictionary, the general meaning of an alliance is any connection between States, usually by a treaty, and it is substantially synonymous with the word "treaty"; so that whenever there is a treaty in the general sense there is an alliance.

Later on he said:

> I have no antipathy to the word "alliance" if it is synonymous with the word "treaty."

A little further on he made this statement:

> I am perfectly prepared to admit, for academic purposes, that we have created a thousand alliances with a score of other nations, and that whenever we make a treaty we make an alliance, as we certainly do in the general acceptation of the word.

Now, Mr. President, I feared that that statement would have just the effect on the country which it evidently has had; I noticed in a number of papers yesterday the statement "friends of the treaty admit that it constitutes an alliance." That is reflected not only in the statement in the newspapers but in telegrams and letters that have reached me, as they have no doubt reached other Senators. For example, here is a typical telegram:

> Vote down the four-power treaty and all such obnoxious alliances.

I want to take just a few minutes on the rather uninteresting subject of whether or not this treaty does constitute an alliance. As I said in reply to the Senator from Missouri the other day, if I thought this treaty did constitute an alliance, I can not conceive of any power that would induce me to vote for it. To find out whether it is an alliance I desire to put into the RECORD some of the definitions from the authorities as to what an alliance is.

Now, I think that I understand perfectly the thought of the Senator from Missouri. He is as much in favor of the treaty as I am, but in his remarks he has taken not the legal meaning of an alliance, but a rather unusual meaning, the one that the people of the country do not have in mind, and therefore I believe if his statement is allowed to go unchallenged it is likely to do great harm. Therefore, not for the purpose of converting the Senator from Missouri, because he needs no conversion—he votes right on this anyhow—but to keep the RECORD straight I desire to put into the RECORD first just what the treaty itself says upon this point. It has been read many times, but I read part of it again:

> The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

Now, obviously, in that statement there is no creation of an alliance. Nobody binds himself to do or not to do any particular thing. But let us read on and see what follows:

> If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

Now, as I understand the term, there is no alliance provided for in that language, but to see whether or not we have a correct understanding of the term let me place in the RECORD some of the definitions that the authorities give for an alliance. I have here the Century Dictionary Encyclopedia. Let us see what statement is made there. Here is the general definition, the one quoted by the Senator from Missouri, not the one the people have in mind at all, but the literary definition. The definition that the people have in mind for an alliance is the idea that nations have bound themselves to do or not to do a particular definite thing and usually for a warlike purpose. When the Senator from Missouri expresses his opinion that this is an "alliance" he places a weapon in the hands of those who seek to misunderstand and misinterpret the treaty. Let us see what this definition is.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator what difference it makes what we call this contract? Is it not wholly immaterial whether we call it an alliance or an association or a league, or what sort of a name we may give it? What difference does it make how we designate it? The document speaks for itself, and I can not quite see the force of drawing any fine distinction about designating it in any way.

Mr. WILLIS. I think the answer to that is at hand. It would not make any difference to the Senator from Florida, and it would not make any difference to myself what we call it, whether we call it a treaty or an alliance or a compact or an agreement or anything else; but if the Senator will bear with me I think I can show him that it makes a tremendous difference upon the public opinion of the country. The Senator must know that there is a propaganda carried on in the country for the purpose of making the people of the country think that if the treaty is ratified the independence of our country is gone. Because that is the effort that is being made, I do not desire any statement made by a friend of the treaty to be used as a means of furnishing a club to those who want to pound the treaty to death.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WILLIS. I certainly do.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It is very interesting to see the internecine strife raging on the other side of the Chamber. I notice that they have to resort to the dictionary to find out "where they are at." I would like to ask the Senator from Ohio how four parties can enter into a partnership contract and any one of them claim afterwards that he is completely independent of the other three?

Mr. WILLIS. But my contention is that four men can sit down and talk about a proposition without going into partnership.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. But if they draw up and sign articles of partnership, does not the partnership exist?

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, yes; if they sign articles of partnership; but there has been no such signing of articles of partnership in this case, as I shall show the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Allow me to remind the Senator that we first consented to the rights of Japan, and impliedly those of Great Britain, in 25,000 islands in the Pacific Ocean, and then we come with another treaty and say we will respect those rights and take measures to defend those rights, if there is aggression against them.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, I do not admit that we do those things at all. I do not admit that we bind ourselves in any way whatsoever to aid any of those nations in defending their rights. There is nothing in the treaty that so says.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WILLIS. In just a moment. I want to get through with Senators one at a time.

With reference to the suggestion my friend from Georgia makes, that we have to have dictionaries straighten us out to make our position clear, I want to say to him there is no doubt in my mind about my own position. I am endeavoring to straighten out my friend from Missouri. That is the object of this effort.

I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope the Senator from Ohio will develop further his thought upon the propaganda which is being carried on against the treaty. I wish he would put in the RECORD who is raising the money for the carrying on of this propaganda.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator knows, let him put it in the RECORD. I do not know. I am not concerned about those matters.

Mr. FRANCE. Perhaps he knows who is carrying on the propaganda and paying the bills for propaganda in favor of the treaties?

Mr. WILLIS. I certainly do not, and if there is any such propaganda and any bills are being paid, the Senator would seem to know more about them than I do. I have not heard of it; I have no information about it; but if the Senator knows about it, why does he not put the information in the RECORD?

Mr. FRANCE. I know that millions of dollars must be paid to carry on the propaganda in favor of the treaty which is being carried on. I have received at my own desk enough material to almost convince me that the treaties are desirable if I did not know something about them.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish the Senator might be altogether convinced.

Mr. FRANCE. Fortunately for the Senator from Maryland, he has taken the trouble to acquaint himself with the real conditions in Europe.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know about that, either.

Mr. FRANCE. And it takes something more than a paid propaganda to change my views upon the subject. I wish to say to the Senator that even prepared lectures are being sent out to women's clubs. I am sorry that I have not a sample of one of those prepared lectures being sent out to women's clubs so that any woman who wishes to read a lecture upon the great desirability of the adoption of the treaties can do so without any cost to herself and without any trouble whatever. The number of lectures that are being sent out——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I want still to retain my right to the floor. If the Senator from Maryland has any information upon these matters, if there is a fund collected to send out propaganda for the treaty or against it, and if he has that information let him put it in the RECORD. I do not have that information, and I do not care much about it. I yield now to my colleague.

Mr. FRANCE. I shall be very glad to have an investigation made. I thought perhaps the Senator from Ohio had some information as to the propaganda to which he referred. I have no positive information. I have some suspicion.

Mr. WILLIS. All I know is that there is propaganda sent out against the treaty in most insidious form. Who is back of it I do not know, and I do not care, because I do not believe it is going to get anywhere.

Mr. FRANCE. In what form does the Senator refer to it—insidious form?

Mr. WILLIS. In the form of letters, in the form of identical telegrams, in the form of messages of various sorts. The Senator is well acquainted with propaganda.

Mr. FRANCE. I wish the whole question of the expense of carrying on this propaganda might be investigated.

Mr. WILLIS. I have not the slightest objection to that.

Mr. FRANCE. If we could have an investigation and all the facts disclosed, I assure the Senator that the facts would be most interesting to the American people and not at all helpful to the Republican Party.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator desires an investigation, he can move for it. If he has any information he can put it in the RECORD. I do not care for it; I am not interested in it, because I think the question will be settled before the investigation could be had.

I again yield to my colleague.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not rise to ask my colleague a question, but in view of the statement that has been made by the Senator from Maryland to the effect that there were millions being expended on propaganda favoring the treaty, I should like to have some specific information as to just one dollar that was furnished in that behalf. Then when it comes to the designation of the senders of such literature as is being sent out to Senators, it would be interesting to know whether that literature was sent because of promptings of the heart in favor of the treaty or because of the purse to which he refers.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland for a brief reply.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to say that I rose not to give information but to ask information from the junior Senator from Ohio, who seemed to be in possession of some facts with reference to the propaganda against the treaty.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator will listen he will get information, but I am not posing as an authority upon propaganda. If the Senator knows anything about this matter of collecting funds, let him have an investigation or put his information in the RECORD. I know nothing about it and I care nothing about it, because the treaties will all be ratified before he will get his investigations started anyhow.

Mr. FRANCE. Possibly.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, I proceed with the proposition I had in mind, namely, the placing in the RECORD of some definitions from authorities for the benefit of my friend, the Senator from Missouri. I have here the Century Dictionary Encyclopedia, which gives the following definition of "Alliance":

> Union between nations, contracted by compact, treaty, or league. Such an alliance may be defensive; that is, an agreement to defend each other when attacked; or offensive; that is, an agreement to make a combined attack on another nation; or it may be both offensive and defensive.

Now, it must be perfectly apparent to one who thinks of it for a moment that there is nothing in this so-called four-power agreement contemplating anything of that sort. No distortion of language, no torture of words can make it appear that there is any agreement here by which we are bound to defend any nation if they are attacked.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. POMERENE. Does not my colleague think that there is another signification attached to the word "alliance," irrespective of whether it is of an offensive or defensive character? In other words, when we speak of alliances between nations we sometimes speak of them as alliances of offense, or alliances of defense, or alliances of offense and defense; but there may be alliances for other purposes, for purely altruistic purposes, for peace purposes, and so forth, without any reference to the hostile phase. In that sense, it seems to me, that my colleague, as well as myself, may well say this is an alliance or it is an association in the more comprehensive sense and not in the restricted sense.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, the point I was seeking to make clear, as my colleague will observe, is the fact that the alliance that the people of this country have in mind is an alliance such as we have always understood the word to mean, either for offensive or defensive purposes. When the senior Senator from Missouri, or any other friend of the treaty, announces that this is an "alliance," it seems to me that that statement is likely to be misunderstood. Therefore, I have thought it proper to put into the RECORD three or four of the definitions of the term "alliance." Here is one from the Encyclopedia Britanica. Let us ascertain what that work says:

> Alliance, in international law—

That is, as the word is used in international law—

> Alliance, in international law, a league between independent States, defined by treaty, for the purpose of combined action, defensive or offensive, or both.

Here is another authority on international law, Oppenheim, volume 1. Let us see what his definition is:

> Alliances, in the strict sense of the term, are treaties of union between two or more States for the purpose of defending each other against an attack in war or of jointly attacking third States, or for both purposes.

Then here is the statement which is made in Wheaton's work on international law:

> Treaties of alliance may be either defensive or offensive. In the first case the engagements of the ally extend only to a war really and truly defensive; to a war of aggression first commenced, in point of fact, against the other contracting party. In the second the ally engages generally to cooperate in hostilities against a specified power or against any power with whom the other party may be engaged in war.

And so on, bringing out the same idea that has already been brought out in the definitions which I have quoted from the other authorities. Then, here is the definition given in Bouvier's Law Dictionary:

ALLIANCE.

In international law: A contract, treaty, or league between two or more sovereigns or States, made for purposes of aggression or defense.

Defensive alliances are those in which a nation agrees to defend her ally in case the latter is attacked.

Offensive alliances are those in which nations unite for the purpose of making an attack or jointly waging the war against another nation.

Now, carrying out the idea suggested by my colleague:

The term is also used in a wider sense embracing unions for objects of common interest to the contracting parties, as the "holy alliance" entered into in 1815 by Prussia, Austria, and Russia for the purpose of counteracting the revolutionary movement in the interest of political liberalism. (From Bouvier's Law Dictionary, third revision, 1914, volume 1, page 180.)

I call attention to the fact that the same idea is set forth there, that this is an agreement among nations to do or not to do a certain thing. Then I will quote one other authority, Mr. President. This is Black's Law Dictionary, and the definition contained in that work is substantially the same as the one already quoted:

ALLIANCE IN INTERNATIONAL LAW.

A union or association of two or more States or nations, formed by league or treaty, for the joint prosecution of a war, or for their mutual assistance and protection in repelling hostile attacks.

Mr. President, without spending any further time on quotations from the authorities, having called attention to what the authorities define an alliance to be and what the treaty says, I think it would be useful again to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the statement which was made when this treaty was presented to the Conference on Limitation of Armament by the spokesman of the American delegation, whose language has already been quoted on the floor of the Senate a number of times, but I quote it again because of its applicability to this particular question. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in presenting this treaty to the conference said in part:

Each signer is bound to respect the rights of the others and before taking action in any controversy to consult with them. There is no provision for the use of force to carry out any of the terms of the agreement, and no military or naval sanction lurks anywhere in the background or under cover of these plain and direct clauses.

The surest way to prevent war is to remove the causes of war. This is an attempt to remove causes of war over a great area of the globe's surface by reliance upon the good faith and honest intentions of the nations which sign the treaty, solving all differences through the processes of diplomacy and joint consideration and conciliation.

So that the treaty itself contains no language indicating that it is an alliance. It does not conform to the definition of an alliance given by the authorities, and when it was presented by the spokesman for the American delegation it was specifically denied that it was an alliance.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Suppose America and Great Britain were to enter into a treaty to circulate the Bible in China and Japan, and nothing more. Would that not be an alliance? Would it not be an alliance to circulate the Bible in China and Japan?

I wish to say further in reference to the matter of reservations that I have heard of some pious people who have been so extremely careful that before they would indorse the Lord's Prayer they would want some reservations.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, in reply to the question propounded by the Senator from Minnesota, I desire to say that, of course, I agree with him in this respect: I think such an agreement as he suggests would be a very desirable one for the United States and Great Britain to make; but I do not think, Mr. President, that that would be an alliance as the term is understood by the American people. The only reason why I am combating the idea set forth by the Senator from Missouri is that I think it may be used, and is being used, to the detriment of the forces which are in favor of the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio can trace any resemblance between the Lord's Prayer and the Yap treaty and the four-power treaty, I would be very much edified to listen to him do so, especially as Japan, one of the parties to this arrangement, does not believe in the Lord or in His prayer.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I will leave that to my distinguished and able friend, the Senator from Minnesota, who brought that element into the discussion, and who is entirely able to take care of himself.

Proceeding further, Mr. President, not only did the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in presenting this document to the conference specifically call attention to the fact that it did not provide an alliance and that it did not involve the use of force, but it was so understood by the other members of the conference. With other Senators I was present at that conference, and no man who sensed that situation can feel otherwise than that when the Senator from Massachusetts spoke to that conference he spoke that which met with the practically unanimous approval of every delegate to the conference, as well as of those of us who had the privilege of witnessing the ceremony. The fact that when that document was presented and when the question came up next day on the approval of the minutes there was no objection to it, it seems to me places upon the treaty an interpretation that can not well be attacked.

Mr. President, some Senator has quoted something from the distinguished Frenchman, Mr. Viviani. Let us see what he said. I quote from page 107 of the minutes, where Mr. Viviani said in part:

We should, however, be remiss indeed—we should be slighting the open-handed and sumptuous hospitality offered us by America and failing in our manifest duty, if we did not attempt to stress the moral worth of the agreement and thereby give this memorable day its true historic character. This moral value has just been alluded to by Mr. LODGE; he has pointed out that when four great powers are determined that peace shall prevail in a given part of the world, the concert of these powers, without provision for naval or military action, is all that is needed to assure the preservation, the guaranty, and the protection of that peace.

He admits openly there is no provision for military or naval action, and by implication the countries which were represented and which entered into this treaty are perfectly free hereafter to act as they may deem proper.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I do not have before me the minutes of the conference, but the Senator will find, as I recall, on the page next to that from which he is reading, or probably the preceding page, that Mr. Viviani divided his argument with respect to the treaty into two categories. He discusses the juridical value of the treaty and then he discusses it from a moral standpoint, referring to its moral value and the sense of honor that might result from the agreement. When he uses the words "juridical value," obviously, as an acute and able lawyer, as Mr. Viviani is, he was speaking of its legalistic characteristic, of its value as a legal contract, of its juridical value, meaning thereby its binding legal force or value. Now, I ask the Senator what is its juridical value, what is its legal binding force, in contradistinction to the moral element, to which Mr. Viviani referred?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Utah I desire to say that I have just read what Mr. Viviani states to be the moral value of the treaty. He is not talking about the juridical value of it at all. The Senator thought that it was on the next page, but it is on the very page—page 107—from which I have been reading. It is there where he is estimating the moral value. Of course, if he desires to discuss the juridical value of it, the opinion of Mr. Viviani, as it was the opinion of every other delegate to the conference, as it must have been, because it was accepted unanimously and expressly, was that this treaty was simply an agreement to confer; that there was no binding action provided for at all.

Now, Mr. President, let us see how far we have gotten. In the first place——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Of course, I do not accept the view of the Senator. An alliance does not frighten me at all; I believe in a world alliance, an alliance which involves force.

Mr. WILLIS. It does not frighten me, but I do not believe in a world alliance, nor a world supergovernment. That, however, is not material here.

Mr. KING. I was about to ask the Senator what value does he ascribe to this treaty? Is it a mere consultative agreement, or is there not some obligation resting upon the signatories to the treaty to do something in the event there is an aggressive movement that threatens the invasion of the insular dominions which are covered by the treaty?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I intended to touch upon that, and will touch upon it more at length later on in my remarks; but I want to say just here that if the Senator takes the view that a mere agreement to confer and talk over a situation has no value in promoting the peace of the world, then I must disagree with him totally. As I understand this document, we are not bound to any action at all; but the mere fact that four great powers come together here and talk over the situation and bind themselves to confer in the future when certain classes of questions arise I think has tremendous value in promoting the peace of the world.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. May I ask the Senator from Ohio whether, in his address—to which I am listening with great pleasure—he has passed the point where he is straightening me out? I ask because, if he has passed that point, I wonder if he will yield for a moment to enable me to say something?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I would not undertake to fix the precise point at which I quit trying to straighten the Senator out. I do not want to establish any such point. In other words, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to proceed just a little bit further, and then I shall listen to him with great delight, as I always do.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should like to have the Senator from Ohio say what he understands to be the meaning of the pledge which we make to adopt measures to resist the aggressions of a fifth power, for instance.

Mr. WILLIS. I did not understand the first portion of the Senator's question.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The pact, as I understand, binds us not only to confer but to adopt the measures thought best to resist the aggressions of an outside power on one of these four powers. What does the Senator think that means?

Mr. WILLIS. I think it means exactly what it says—that we are to confer about it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Then you adopt measures, do you not?

Mr. WILLIS. We confer about it and then——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. You adopt measures?

Mr. WILLIS. Just wait. The Senator can not ask a question and answer it. This conference is held, and the matter is talked over, and then we do whatever we please, so far as the terms of this treaty are concerned.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, let the Senator turn to his dictionary and see what the word "measures" means.

Mr. WILLIS. I think I understand that without bothering to look at the dictionary. The point I make is, and I think the Senator understands me very clearly, that the mere conference that is provided for in this treaty has tremendous value in promoting the peace of the world; and after the conference is held this Government is not bound to do anything, but is perfectly free legally and morally.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. But a conversation is not a measure, is it, and a measure is not a conversation?

Mr. WILLIS. That would be an interesting academic question to discuss, but I have stated my view of this matter.

Now, Mr. President, I want to go just a little further with this matter. I have read what the spokesman of the American delegation stated when the treaty was presented, and that statement was accepted as an authoritative interpretation. Now let me see what the delegation itself said when it presented this treaty to the President in its report, page 824:

> When controversies arise of the character stated in the article, the powers merely agree to confer together concerning them. No power binds itself to anything further; and any consents or agreements must be reached in accordance with its constitutional methods. The reference to "consideration and adjustment" does not imply that any agreement can be made at a conference relating to a controversy which would be binding upon the United States unless that agreement is made by constitutional authority. The present treaty promises not an agreement of any sort, but merely consultation.

Then the delegates quote a portion of the language I have already read from the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts, as follows:

> There is no provision for the use of force to carry out any of the terms of the agreement, and no military or naval sanction lurks anywhere in the background or under cover of these plain and direct clauses.

Then the delegates say:

> This statement was made in open conference, in the presence of all the delegates who signed the treaty, and must be regarded as an authoritative and accepted exposition of its import.

So that in the first place the Senator from Massachusetts, speaking for the American delegation, gives the treaty this interpretation; and then the delegates as a whole, in reporting to the President, confirm the statement already made.

Let us see what further statement is made in the address that was made by the President at the close of the conference. On this very point now—and the President is the one who takes the initiative in matters of our foreign policy—the President says on page 868:

> No intrigue, no offensive or defensive alliances, no involvements have wrought your agreements, but reasoning with each other to common understanding has made new relationships among governments and peoples, new securities for peace, and new opportunities for achievement and attending happiness.

So that the authorities, to start with, furnish no basis for the contention that this is an alliance as the people understand that term; secondly, there is nothing in the treaty itself to give color to such a claim; in the third place, the spokesman for the American delegation so interprets the treaty in presenting it to the conference, and that interpretation is accepted by the conference, and the American delegation places upon it the same interpretation when the treaty is presented to the President; and in the fourth place, the President of the United States in his address to the conference places upon the treaty the same interpretation.

But that was not all. So that there could be no question about it, the President in his address here dealt with that particular proposition. He said in the address that he made to the Senate in presenting this treaty:

> The conclusions reached and the covenants written neither require nor contemplate compulsive measures against any power in the world, signatory or nonsignatory. The offerings are free will; the conscience is that of world opinion; the observance is a matter of national honor.

Then he says, further on in his address to the Senate:

> Therefore I can bring you every assurance that nothing in any of these treaties commits the United States or any other power to any kind of an alliance, entanglement, or involvement. It does not require us or any power to surrender a worth-while tradition. It has been said, if this be true, these are mere meaningless treaties, and therefore valueless. Let us accept no such doctrine of despair as that. If nations may not establish by mutual understanding the rules and principles which are to govern their relationship; if a sovereign and solemn plight of faith by leading nations of the earth is valueless; if nations may not trust one another, then, indeed, there is little on which to hang our faith in advancing civilization or the furtherance of peace.

Then a little further on in his address he said:

> There is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no written or moral obligation to join in defense.

Further on he said:

> If nations may not safely agree to respect each other's rights and may not agree to confer if one to the compact threatens trespass, or may not agree to advise if one party to the pact is threatened by an outside power, then all concerted efforts to tranquilize the world and stabilize peace must be flung to the winds.

The statement which the President of the United States makes in presenting the treaties to the Senate is exactly in harmony, first, with the clear meaning of the treaties themselves; second, with the interpretation placed upon them by the spokesman for the American delegation; third, with the interpretation placed upon the treaties by the delegation in making its report to the President.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is not the President inconsistent in the very sentences which the Senator has just read?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not think so.

Mr. KING. He speaks about commitments and about covenants, and deplores a situation which would render agreements and covenants and commitments not binding upon those who make them. Then, in the next breath——

Mr. WILLIS. I believe the Senator is mistaken there. I am inclined to think the word "covenant" is not used. I hope that the President has excised that term. I think it is not in here; but no matter.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator used the word "covenant," but if the Senator objects to that I will use the word "agreement" and the word "commitment."

Mr. WILLIS. Well, let us talk about the language of the President. That is what the Senator is inquiring about. Here is his language now. The President says:

> There is no commitment to armed force.

Does the Senator think there is?

Mr. KING. Will the Senator read two or three sentences before that? I have not the address before me. The Senator just read them.

Mr. WILLIS. I will commence clear back near the beginning of that paragraph:

> In case of controversy between the covenanting powers—

Mr. KING. "Covenanting powers."

Mr. WILLIS (continuing):

it is agreed to confer and seek adjustment, and if said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any outside power these friendly powers, respecting one another, are to communicate, perhaps confer, in order to understand what action may be taken, jointly or separately, to meet a menacing situation.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator read a little further, please.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

There is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no written or moral obligation to join in defense, no expressed or implied commitment to arrive at any agreement except in accordance with our constitutional methods.

Mr. KING. The Senator read a moment ago, I think, from the President's address in which he deplores a situation where nations could not meet together and where they would not be bound by any commitment or covenant which they had made. Now, I ask the Senator if there is anything in the President's statement, does it not mean that there is something in these treaties, or in this treaty, or in treaties which are desired, which calls for commitments and understandings and agreements which will eventuate in keeping the peace either of the signatory powers or, in part, of the world?

Mr. WILLIS. I think the President's statement is perfectly clear. I will read it again to the Senator. It will do him good:

There is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no written or moral obligation to join in defense, no expressed or implied commitment to arrive at any agreement except in accordance with our constitutional methods.

I think that is perfectly clear.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will not the Senator read the reservation adopted by the committee in that conjunction?

Mr. WILLIS. That is what I was just about to do when I was diverted by the inquiry of the Senator from Utah. I was just about to read that.

Mr. President, let us summarize and see how far we have gone.

First. I have read the authorities, and the authorities furnish no color to the view that this is an alliance.

Second. There is nothing in the treaty that, to my mind at least, indicates that it is an alliance.

In the third place, the Senator from Massachusetts, the spokesman of the American delegation, in presenting the treaty to the conference, specifically stated that it was not an alliance.

In the fourth place, the American delegation adopted that statement as its own, and used even a stronger statement when it presented the treaty to the President.

In the fifth place, when the President brings it here, he uses in presenting it the language which I have just quoted.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President—and in this I think I agree entirely with my friend, the junior Senator from Missouri—so far as I am concerned, I am entirely satisfied with that. It makes it perfectly clear to me, and I am satisfied to vote for the treaty without any further explanation or reservation.

But there are able Senators who do not share the view entertained by the Senator from Missouri and by myself, as far as that is concerned, and they desire that this language shall be added as a reservation:

The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

I think I can read the signs of the times, and in all probability that reservation will be adopted, and I am entirely willing that it shall be adopted; when it shall have been adopted it seems to me that there can not be any question in the mind of any thinking person as to what this conference, the American delegation, the President, and the American Senate meant to do. They did not mean to enter into any alliance. They have negatived that as clearly as the English language can negative a proposition.

It is interesting to note that there is not any foreign Government which is raising any question about the interpretation of this language. The only question being raised is that raised in our own country, particularly in the Senate Chamber.

I have spoken this much, Mr. President, not because I have any quarrel with my friend the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], who will vote for the treaty, as I shall, but because I thought the interpretation he placed upon it was likely to be damaging, and I feel that it is damaging in that it is being used as the basis of an assertion going before the American people that a distinguished and able and eloquent advocate of the treaty, as the Senator himself is, openly admits that it is an alliance. I think it is not an alliance, and if I thought that it were such an alliance as his language seems to indicate he thinks it might be I certainly could not bring myself to vote for the ratification of this treaty. I think that this treaty and the other treaties pending before the Senate are America's answer to the cry of a world warworn and weary and calling for leadership, and I think the country has responded well to that call.

The Conference for the Limitation of Armament had as its beginning, as its inauguration, the mightiest spectacle this country has perhaps ever seen, one which I trust it may not be called upon again to see, and that was the great ceremony incident to armistice day last year. We saw the long lines of people, from daylight until away into the night, marching through the Rotunda of the Capitol to show respect at the casket of America's heroic dead. Then, on armistice day we heard the trampling of thousands of feet, we saw the marching of the military, we saw the meeting of the representatives of the Governments of all the earth, and we heard the eloquent address made by the President of the United States; but I thought as I looked out over that vast crowd of 50,000 people that there were others there in spirit, even though we could not see them. I thought that I saw standing out in the mists the figures of the 100,000 boys who gave up their lives over yonder that there might be peace and the preservation of free government. I thought I saw those boys standing there at "Present arms" to do honor to the memory of this soldier, the unknown dead.

The spirit of the Washington conference was born in that solemn hour when with bated breath and tear-dimmed eyes a sobbing, heartbroken world stood on armistice day at the grave of the unknown soldier at Arlington. In high, solemn purpose this Nation then and there resolved that it must not be again. The pending treaties are America's answer to the world's call for leadership.

Then when, the next day, the conference met, and when some of us sensed the spirit of that meeting, we could not have believed that this effort to realize the things for which those soldiers fought could possibly be questioned in this country; they might be questioned elsewhere, but not here. Mr. President, when we have thought it all over, we will realize that we have come to the time when not hatred and suspicion are to rule in the world, but rather good feeling and confidence. If we are to proceed on the theory that every other nation is made up of liars and thieves and murderers, whom we may not under any circumstances trust, then we have come to an end of all treaties. If that is to be the position we are to take, there is only one thing to do, and that is to arm to the teeth and to fortify. Those who say we should defeat this treaty, unthoughtedly are themselves by their acts making possible the continuance of the most threatening alliance in the world—that is, the Anglo-Japanese alliance—playing into the hands of those who would maintain that alliance.

Those who say that these treaties ought to be defeated, by their acts are saying, "Let us go on in the manufacture of more deadly poisonous gases; let us go on in the construction of more stealthy, murderous submarines; let us go on building stronger fortifications; let us go on constructing more $40,000,000 battleships."

Those are the two courses which are open to this country, and I believe, Mr. President, when we think it out, there will not be much doubt about what the attitude of the Senate will be. Either we shall ratify these treaties and throw our influence in the scale in the interest of peace and confidence and mutual understanding, or else we shall defeat them and announce to the world that we intend to arm to the teeth in the fierce rivalry of competitive armament.

This conference had been planned by the President and the Secretary of State and had more than once received the cordial sanction of both branches of Congress. Indeed as I now recall the Senate by unanimous vote had specifically urged the limitation of naval armaments and asked the calling of a conference for that purpose.

In cordial cooperation the President designated two distinguished Members of the Senate as delegates representing America. On what theory can the Senate now repudiate its own act, throw overboard its own representatives and make ridiculous the whole country by refusing to agree to the very things without which limitation of armament is impossible?

President Wilson went to Europe. I do not criticise that, but I call attention simply to the fact that he went to Europe. President Harding brought Europe and Asia to America, and induced them, under his leadership, to accept an American plan of peace and mutual understanding. I think that when the votes are counted it will be found that the Senate will sustain the President of the United States in his patriotic effort to interpret the high hope of the world.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, my good friend, the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], was pleased to say that his purpose in speaking was to make an attempt to straighten out the junior Senator from Missouri as to the meaning of the word "alliance." By my silence I do not want it to be even inferred that the junior Senator from Missouri needed any straightening out or interpretation of what an alliance is, nor do I think that my good friend from Ohio made any substantial progress in his declared intention.

There can not be the slightest difference between him and me, if he will but look in the dictionary, and let his mind revert to what the word "alliance" means; nor is there any mistake among the people of the United States as to what an alliance is. What kind of an alliance is it of which the Senator from Ohio is all the time thinking? It is an offensive and defensive alliance. It is an allance which means war. That is not the common understanding of the word "alliance."

What is the most familiar illustration of an alliance which the rank and file of the American people know anything about? It is marriage. Marriage is the most familiar alliance. Does the Senator from Ohio think that is offensive and defensive? Every time there is a meeting of minds between individuals or between States there is an alliance. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], with that keen good sense which characterizes everything he does, struck the nail on the head when he said that if the United States and Great Britain were to agree to send the Bible to China, there would be an alliance between Great Britain and the United States for the purpose of sending the word of God to China. There is nothing in the word "alliance" which anybody need stumble at or be fearful of.

The Senator from Ohio does not seem to be able to get out of his mind that there is something in the word "alliance" that breeds war, or that means trouble, or that has the idea of force. I agree with him that there is not the slightest word in this treaty, from the beginning to the end of it, which has any such meaning; that there is not a word in this treaty which can even inferentially be tortured to mean an alliance that is associated with force, or that is defensive or offensive.

If he, among the dictionaries which he was good enough to read from, as they lay upon his desk, would look a little further in the Century Dictionary, from which he quoted, he would find that an alliance is a union between nations contracted by treaty. That is precisely what this is. He would have found in the same dictionary that an alliance is any joining of interests by States. If we join the interests of the United States with those of any other nation regarding the extradition of criminals, there is an alliance.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. SPENCER. In just a moment. If the Senator from Ohio had read a little further in Bouvier's Law Dictionary, to which he referred, he would have found that an alliance, in its wider sense—and I think he did quote this—is a union of States for any object of common interest. There must be no mistake between the Senator from Ohio and myself. If he used my word "alliance" as the mere text around which he desired to cluster the beautiful thoughts and eloquent language which followed, I have no objection. I have heard ministers before who did not stick any closer to a text than that. I am perfectly willing that he should have used what I said as a text; but there is no difference between the Senator from Ohio and myself. I know that the proposed treaty does not have the shadow of a meaning of alliance as he construes the word "alliance," but he underestimates the intelligence of the American people if he thinks that in the rank and file of the farms and towns of this country they do not know, just as well as we know in the Senate, that in its general meaning an alliance is any agreement between nations to do anything; and when we agree with Great Britain and with France and with Japan, in this treaty, to confer in case difficulties arise in the future, in its general sense, of course, we have an alliance, and there is no sense in shutting our eyes to that fact; but there is not a breath of a defensive or offensive alliance.

Now I yield to the Senator from Maryland, and I thank him for his courtesy in waiting until I had finished.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is a very eminent lawyer, and, as I can testify, one who uses English very carefully. I desire to ask him if he wishes to maintain that the word "agreement" and the word "alliance" mean the same?

Mr. SPENCER. The dictionary calls them synonyms. I think they are, too. If the Senator will open the pages of the dictionary he will find as a synonym for the word "alliance" the words "agreement," "contract," and "treaty."

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, using those words as synonyms would lead us into endless difficulties over verbiage and the meaning of language; but I think the debate has developed quite clearly this fact, that the Senator from Missouri is for this treaty, believing it to be an alliance, and that the Senator from Ohio is for it, believing it not to be an alliance.

Mr. SPENCER. I wish the Senator from Maryland were for it, whatever it might be called, because the main thing is what it intends to do. The word is insignificant. It is folly to magnify a word and forget the principle or the thought.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I am very much pleased that the Senator from Missouri has suggested the very thought which I had intended to develop. The Senator from Ohio has said that the European statesmen were not quibbling about whether this was an alliance or whether it was not an alliance. Certainly they are not quibbling, because they know that it makes no difference whether it is an alliance or whether it is not an alliance.

The Triple Entente was not an alliance. There was no formal treaty agreement between Russia and Great Britain, except perhaps the mere passing of a letter, and yet that was a powerful association between the two nations, and it was in part as a result of that entente that the triple alliance became such a menace. In other words, the mere matter of terms has nothing to do with it. The principle is what we should examine.

As I have already said, Washington warned us not merely against entangling alliances but against showing special favors to a particular nation as distinguished from other nations. He warned us against any particular association with one group of nations, because he realized that if we showed favoritism to one group we would excite the jealousy and animosity of all the others.

Now, there is a law—and I may say in passing that the associations of men with each other, the associations of nations with each other, are all, in my judgment, subject to certain fundamental principles and laws which act as inevitably as the laws of physics and dynamics.

The history of the world discloses the fact that, generally speaking, if we review the past, great nations have been developed for the purpose of aggrandizing themselves at the expense of other nations. The leading nations of the past have been imperial nations, and the imperial nation has organized in each particular instance to aggrandize itself. That is the way the law operates. A nation starts to develop an imperial policy, a policy of self-aggrandizement at the expense of the other nations. It goes on developing that imperial policy.

You can trace the thing in history from the beginning of the world. Take Rome as an example. The imperial policy of Rome developed self-aggrandizement until reaction set in, the reaction of the weak against the strong. The imperial policy of Rome developed until a counteraction took place among the weak, until the weak became strong enough to balance the imperial policy and action of the Roman Empire, and when the balance takes place there is a status of peace which is maintained up until the counteralliance, or the counterassociation or the counteraction, or whatever you may call it, becomes powerful enough first to check and finally to overthrow the aggrandizing nation or power.

Now that is the law. The same thing occurred prior to the last war. Take either association. Take the German side. We will see that the Germans, for reasons which we need not discuss, following the imperial policy, started self-aggrandizement. Germany associatel herself with other nations in the Triple Alliance. The reaction to that was the Triple Entente. The aggrandizement of Germany could not go on because counteraction took place—the Triple Entente. There came the balance of power, and then there came the test of strength, which was the World War. The moment the World War was over the same principles began to operate, the British Empire vastly extending her territory as the result of war, the Japanese Empire vastly extending her territory, the French Imperial Republic having materially extended her territory. All, having embarked upon an imperial policy, wished us to join as a protective element as they proceeded to carry out their imperial policies.

The inevitable result of the four-power pact between the United States and the three empires—and I care not whether you call it an alliance, an entente, an association, or what you call it—a result as inevitable as the result of the law of action and reaction in physics, will be the reaction which will cause the weak to suspect that this is an association, an entente or an understanding, between the great empires for further aggrandizement of those empires, and, actuated by the law of self-protection, the others will certainly consolidate themselves in some way in opposition to it. If that does not take place, then the law which I have been attempting to discuss is not a law and there is no law which governs the organization of nations with reference to each other.

But there is a law, and its action can be traced from the days of the first empire down until the present time. It has always operated. There was a combination in opposition to Alexander. There was a combination in opposition to Charlemagne. There was a combination in opposition to Napoleon; and if it had not been so the dominion of France to-day would extend over the continent of Europe, because, unchecked by a counterforce, Napoleon would have conquered Europe and would have set up a permanent European world empire.

There is a law of action and reaction. Napoleon, of course, carried on his campaign and carried on his policy of imperial aggrandizement until there had to be formed against him an association which checked him and which finally overthrew him.

Now, it is just as inevitable that, as a result of these four nations getting together, one Republic in company with three empires—and let me tell you that there can be no real friendship, no real association, between a Republic founded upon the principles of the Declaration of Independence and an empire founded upon the theory of the divine right of kings and the right of might to exploit any people——

Mr. NELSON. Is not France a republic?

Mr. FRANCE. France is an imperial republic, sir, with colonies in every part of the world—republic in form but a real descendant of the Napoleonic Empire.

There can be—and I have already quoted the authorities—no real association between nations moving in the imperial direction, in the direction of domination, in the directon of subjugation, in the direction of exploitation, and a Republic such as ours, which is moving in the very opposite direction, in the direction of self-determination, of liberation, of emancipation, of elevation, of education.

The Senator from Minnesota referred to a union between the British Empire and the United States for the carrying of the Bible to the backward peoples. If he knew anything about the history of the British Empire he would not have used that simile. The noblest people in the world are the English-speaking people with whom we are related, and if they would get a Government which would truly express their best aspirations we could cooperate with them; but they have been unable for some strange reason to do it. The British Government, so far from ever being in favor of the dissemination of Christian knowledge, has been in opposition, as I have already shown upon this floor by the testimony of British writers, to the spread of education and of Christianity in their own colonies, notably in Africa.

Mr. NELSON. I would call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the fact that it was in Great Britain that the first Bible society was organized for the distribution of the Bible, and we followed them.

Mr. FRANCE. So I have already intimated. Before I made the statement I referred to the noble attributes of the English people. In fact, the Society of Great Britain for the Protection of Aboriginal Peoples, the missionary societies of Great Britain, the great organizations for the spread of education and of Christianity in foreign lands, have met with the opposition of the imperial statesmen who have the empire in their hands; and perfectly consistently so, because it is certain, as some of the British imperialists have contended, and I can quote to the Senator some of the statements that the moment you Christianize a man and educate a man he wants to become self-governing. Is not that true, may I ask the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. Evidently the English have been Christianizing Egypt, because she now wants to be a self-governing nation.

Mr. FRANCE. In developing the Egyptians, if they had gone to Egypt as I hope they did, if they had trained the Egyptians, if they had Christianized the Egyptians, if they had fitted them for self-government, if they had then extended to them self-government, that would be a policy quite contrary to the policy of imperialism; and when they liberated Egypt they did something quite inconsistent with the imperialistic policy of which I am speaking. I am quite sure that under American leadership the British could have been persuaded to the adoption of an American as distinguished from an imperialstic policy in the administration of the affairs of the Empire.

But I was about to say when I was diverted the association of the United States with the three great Empires, just as inevitably as the sun rises and sets, just as inevitably as action brings reaction, will bring a counteraction in the world which must come if those four powers are not finally to spread their dominion to every part of the globe.

The Japanese are moving into Siberia. To-day they are probably fighting on the frontiers between eastern Siberia and the country immediately around Vladivostok. It is quite possible that Vladivostok may already have fallen. The Japanese absolutely unchecked would certainly move on to a larger expansion of the Japanese Empire; the British unchecked would undoubtedly add to their territory; the French unchecked would undoubtedly add to theirs. We are seeking no new territory. But there will be a reaction and combination of the weaker powers against the stronger, and that process will go on until there comes to be a perfect balance of power, in which one group is counterbalanced by the other group, and that balance of power will be maintained until the weaker group decides to move against the stronger. Then there will be another war.

I am astonished that anybody would say that the four-power pact is America's answer to the great problem of the war. It is not America's answer; it is not, I feel, President Harding's answer. I wish that the great President, Mr. Harding, had been able to take charge of the peace conference. We then should have had a different result. He arose at the beginning of that conference and spoke the words which would have made that conference a success if they had been heeded.

He said:

> All of us demand liberty and justice. There can not be one without the other, and they must be held the unquestioned possessions of all peoples. Inherent rights are of God, and the tragedies of the world originate in their attempted denial. The world to-day is infringing their enjoyment by arming to defend or deny, when simple sanity calls for their recognition through common understanding.

Sirs, if those words had been heeded, something would have come out of this conference that would have been worthy of America—an association, a concert of all the nations, based upon the principle that there should be a common world recognition of inherent human rights. If that sort of an agreement had come out of the conference, how changed at once would have been the whole aspect of the world. The restlessness and feverish turmoil in India would have been stilled, because there would have gone forth this to India: "Prepare yourselves for self-government; show your capacity; you will be given every right to try yourselves in administrative offices, and when you are able to administer your government you may be free to join as a full member of the family of nations." The same thing would have been true of Egypt; the same thing would have been true of South Africa. That was what President Wilson advocated when he went to Europe; that is what he realized to a very large degree in the League of Nations. Personally I was opposed to the League of Nations because I did not think it met the situation; because I did not think it included enough nations; and I did not think that it clearly affirmed that its object was the realization to all men everywhere ultimately of their inalienable rights.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FRANCE. I merely wish to add that that plan was so much better than this that there can be no comparison. There is almost the difference between the two that there is between twilight and night. Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was very much interested in the last observation made by the Senator from Maryland, as well as all of the observations he has made in his very admirable speech. I was about to ask the Senator if the challenge made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] the other day can be successfully met, namely, that whenever an alliance is formed by a few nations or a small group of nations, and particularly if those nations be strong, it has not always provoked, and will it not in the very nature of things always provoke, counter alliances and counter groupings which must result in war or in controversy that may involve a large part of the world in war? If the Senator answers that question affirmatively, I ask does it not follow that if the United States is going to depart from its position of complete isolation the only course for us to pursue is to seek a world association of nations in which all nations, great and small, may be brought together in harmonious relation for the purpose of maintaining their rights and securing the peace of the world?

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator's premise is absolutely sound and his conclusion is inevitable. That is what President Wilson recognized when he went to Europe. I do not know what his attitude is upon this particular treaty. Certainly, if he were consistent he must be against it, because as a student of history he recognizes the fact that every alliance has always invited and made inevitable counteralliance. Indeed, to be perfectly accurate, I should modify that statement by saying that even the great and growing strength of one single empire in the world, expanding its territory, invading the rights of others, causes a counter force or an alliance against it. In the early days, of course, the counteralliances were all against one strong power.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me right there, I desire to remind him of a very apt illustration of what he has said. The predominance of Louis XIV, of France, became so menacing to the remainder of the continent and even to Engalnd itself that there was a great federation against him, in which, of course, the Senator knows that the Duke of Marlborough won his fame.

Mr. FRANCE. It has to be so; it is the law of nature. That law operates between men as well as between nations. One group of men organizes and another group organizes against it. Capital and labor in self-protection organizes against it. It is the law of equilibrium. Otherwise in international affairs there could be no equilibrium; there would be only motion in one direction, which would ultimately lead us we know not where, but probably to a great empire, with one man dominating the world, or to chaos.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has suggested that it is an indisputable historic fact that an association or entente between imperial nations leads to a counterassociation. Of course, as for myself, I have long advocated a plan which I think would have accomplished what President Wilson hoped to accomplish when he went to Europe. I think that the recent Washington conference has furnished us pretty strong evidence of the forces with which President Wilson had to contend in Europe, and when we consider what he brought back, compared with the treaty now before us, we must recognize the fact that he brought back something, I may say, almost infinitely better or better to the nth degree. More nations were included in the league; there was the machinery for conciliation not only between those nations but between those nations and nonmember nations, which is the very essence of any such plan. If the League of Nations might be considered an alliance—and I did so consider it, and for that reason I opposed it—this much must be said of it: That it created a machinery by which that alliance would meet before an international court of equity, if I may call it such, the nonmember nations whose rights might be invaded by the league or by any single member of the league, and the presumption is that if the league and all of the members of the league were willing to do that they were willing to do equity. But, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] very clearly brought out in his questions the other day, the pending treaty provides no such machinery, and there is no evidence in this document that the empires which are forming the alliance with this Republic have any disposition in an international court of equity to meet an outsider who may have been wronged by one of the members of the association or coalition.

I will say that, personally, I have long been urging what the Senator from Utah has suggested. I have not gone so far as to say that I wished an association of nations. The plan which I have proposed, and which has been before the Foreign Relations Committee, or at least upon its files for many months, provided for a concert of nations, that term having been used for the reason that I did not wish anything in the relationship between the nations which might be interpreted as a surrender of national sovereignty. It was to be a concert of all of the nations acting together, each member acting as an independent sovereign power for the accomplishment of certain definite ends, for action in recognition of certain fundamental principles, which principles have been enunciated in the basic documents of our Republic, in the Declaration of Independence, and in the Constitution of the United States. I will say that the plan which I finally presented to the Senate has stood the analysis of some of the most eminent of the international lawyers, and would be in every respect a desirable plan.

Mr. President, I did not expect to make any remarks to-day. I merely rose to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. JOHNSON obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the Senator going to make a speech at this time?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am going to take about 15 minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum before he begins? I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg pardon, but I would rather the Senator would not do that. What I am trying to do is to preserve for the RECORD a mere argument to-day, following the line of the arguments that have been advanced here in regard to the four-power pact, and applying them to the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which has been described as the great menace and danger to us; so I beg the Senator to withdraw his request.

Mr. McKELLAR. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. JOHNSON addressed the Senate. After having spoken for several minutes,

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will yield in order that I may suggest the absence of a quorum. The reason why I do it is because there are several Senators who wanted to hear the Senator from California, and they did not know he was going to proceed at this time. If he will permit me, I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, the absence of a quorum has been suggested.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I have a right to object to it, I object to it. I do not know whether I have or not.

Mr. HARRISON. There are several Senators who are not here because they did not know the Senator from California was going to proceed at this time, and I am making the suggestion so that those Senators can be in the Chamber; so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I had proceeded so briefly with what I had to say in order that its thread may be followed—it, perhaps, is of little consequence, but embraces something of argument upon a proposition which I think of more or less importance—that I begin again.

Not only upon this floor, but in the protreaty press and by its official sponsors, it has been iterated and reiterated that the great accomplishment of the new alliance is in terminating the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and that the new alliance is imperatively necessary because it abrogates the old. The Senator from Massachusetts made this very plain, and although I have already quoted the words with which he commenced his plea for ratification I again quote them:

> The chief and most important point in the treaty is the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. That was the main object of the treaty.

The ominous character to us of the Anglo-Japanese alliance is variously described by the advocates of the new treaty as a threat, menace, danger, the object of unrest or suspicion or distrust.

Before the meeting of the Conference on Limitation of Armament the people of the United States had not the slightest idea that their Government intended to enter into any special agreement with Britain, France, and Japan. There had been no suggestion from the responsible agents of the Government that any such course would be pursued. No such agreement lay in the thought or even the dreams of our people. They were thinking of limitation, not combination, of armaments. They had but recently emphatically registered their will concerning agreements with foreign nations which might lead to future difficulties, controversies, or entanglements. The foreign policy of the Nation the ordinary citizen believed to have been definitely settled. If those in charge of the recent conference had said to the people of the United States, "We are about to meet with Great Britain, France, and Japan in the city of Washington to make a treaty with them to supersede or terminate the Anglo-Japanese alliance and for the maintenance of the rights of all of the parties in the Pacific," there would have been such a storm of dissent and disapprobation that the proponents of such a conference would never have dared hold it. For months preceding the conference our people were made to feel the terrible burden of taxation, to understand that a part of it came from armaments on land and sea.

They were wrought to the highest state of exaltation by odes and lyrics to peace, and their minds were carefully prepared for just one thing—the relief of overburdened peoples by limitation of armaments. The first day of the conference came. The fruition of high hopes seemed at hand. The demand for which our people had waited so long and for which their hearts were crying was eloquently made by the Secretary of State, and with one accord there were pæans of praise and thanksgiving all over the world. And then before any work had been completed came the alliance, the treaty before us, which we are now told was the most important work of the conference and which was the great object to be attained. This treaty may have been in the minds of statesmen and was doubtless for many months before the conference. It was not in the minds of our people.

The policy embodied in the four-power treaty is a novelty in the history of our international relations, a sudden sharp turn in the American path in the world. The proponents of the treaty justify that turn by saying that if it were not made we should encounter a certain national danger, a continuance or renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. The advocates of the treaty have all argued alike upon this floor, and not only have the advocates of the treaty adopted the same methods of argument but the distinguished Secretary of State in his letter to the Senator from Alabama presents the treaty in like fashion. All of them have stressed the fact that the treaty announces a purpose of peace; that nothing must be read into it that its words do not clearly require, and that the words of the treaty can not be made other or greater than its unequivocal language sets forth. I desire to apply in the light of what these same gentlemen have said about the Anglo-Japanese alliance the same methods of argumentation to that alliance which have been applied to the four-power treaty, and I wish that the Senate would follow me for a very brief period.

I am now arguing, mind you, in the fashion in which our distinguished brethren upon the other side have argued concerning the four-power treaty.

The four-power treaty, with an eloquence that runs the whole emotional scale, its proponents say, announces a purpose of peace. The Anglo-Japanese alliance equally announces a purpose of peace. The preamble of the Anglo-Japanese alliance announces as its first aim "the consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of eastern Asia and of India." The Senator from Massachusetts counsels us not to torture the words of the four-power treaty into meanings of danger when the words themselves are declaratory of peace. I beg to observe that the words of the Anglo-Japanese alliance are most emphatically declaratory of peace. They assert the maintenance of peace. They assert not only the maintenance of peace but also the consolidation of peace, and not only of peace but of the general peace.

For professions of peacefulness the Anglo-Japanese alliance is definitely superior to the four-power treaty. Its preamble professes peacefulness with a greater emphasis than the four-power treaty. It then professes two other aims. One of them is regarding China, an aim most laudable. The "common interests of all powers in China," it says, are to be preserved. This is to be done, it says, by "insuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire" and also by insuring "the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations in China."

The Senator from Massachusetts must surely give his cordial approval to this aim of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Certainly he will admit that it levels no threat at the United States. It in fact announces the adherence of Great Britain and of Japan to the very policies in China which are most distinctively American policies.

We observe, then, that there is no danger to the United States either in the Anglo-Japanese purpose of maintaining the general peace in the regions of eastern Asia and of India or in an Anglo-Japanese purpose of maintaining the open door in China.

I pass now to the third aim of the Anglo-Japanese alliance as expressed in its preamble, begging the Senator from Massachusetts again to note the innocuousness of the words used. This third aim is centered still on "the regions of eastern Asia and of India."

It does not touch the Pacific. No part of the Anglo-Japanese alliance mentions the Pacific. The Anglo-Japanese alliance is concerned entirely with eastern Asia and India. The four-power treaty, on the other hand, is concerned entirely with the Pacific. It never mentions eastern Asia and India. The two documents deal with two adjacent but different regions.

If treaties then are to be judged by the outward meanings of their words we find ourselves confronted with the amazing fact that the British and the Japanese, having now secured a treaty for the maintenance of peace in a certain region of the world, proceed in compensation to surrender and abrogate a treaty for the maintenance of peace in a certain other region of the world.

This is an amazing fact. I think I may safely go farther. I think I may say that it is a totally unintelligible fact unless, contrary to the views expressed on this floor, these treaties of agreement, of conference, of cooperation, containing meanings broader than their words, and in practice imply a partnership operative beyond their words.

The Japanese had a certain partnership with the British in a region named as eastern Asia and India. They now have a certain partnership with the British and with the French and with us in a region named as the Pacific. How is it possible that they should regard this latter partnership as the equivalent of the former partnership unless the point is the partnership and not the region?

I return, however, for a moment to the third aim of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. It is the maintenance of the rights and interests of the signatory powers in the regions of eastern Asia and of India.

Let us follow the counsel of the eloquent proponents of the treaty and refrain for a moment from torturing the words of treaties. I ask: Is it wrong for the British and the Japanese to join together to maintain peace? Is it wrong that they should join together to maintain the open door? Is it wrong that they should join together to maintain their rights and interests in eastern Asia and India? And why is it dangerous to the United States that they should join together to do these things on the Asiatic mainland, where the United States has no dominions or possessions?

Another question of like tenor is suggested by a consideration of the six articles which follow the preamble of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and which, together with the preamble, constitute the whole of the wording of that alliance.

Nowhere in any of those six articles is there any slightest promise by either Japan or Great Britain to come to the assistance of the other in any war of offense. On the contrary, as fully appears in article 2, the only occasion on which either nation is bound to come to the assistance of the other is an occasion when the rights or interests mentioned in the preamble are endangered by other nations and are the object of what is described as "unprovoked attack or aggressive action" by those other nations.

That is to say, the Government of Great Britain and the Government of Japan, under the terms of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, make war together against a third nation only when the third nation is guilty of an "unprovoked attack" or of an "aggressive action" against the rights or interests of Great Britain or of Japan in the regions of eastern Asia and of India.

Those who accuse us of distorting the plain words of a new alliance should out of their knowledge of international affairs explain frankly to this body just why it is that is that in the verbal circumstances which I have detailed the Anglo-Japanese alliance can be regarded by them as constituting a danger or a problem for this country.

I ask the question, Does the Government of the United States intend to commit an "unprovoked attack" upon British or Japanese interests in the regions of eastern Asia or of India? Does it intend to take "aggressive action" against Britain or Japan in those regions?

The British and the Japanese are members of the Anglo-Japanese partnership. It is a partnership dealing with the Asiatic mainland, a region of the world where we have no dominions or possessions. It is a partnership for peace, which we approve. It is a partnership which by its own terms will not resort to arms unless its rights on the Asiatic mainland are attacked, and we, of course, have no intention of attacking them. And yet this alliance is so dangerous to us—it is asserted to be so dangerous to us—that now we must enter into a treaty covering us from it, shielding us from it, purchasing us a security from it.

I have made it clear, I think, that the danger of the Anglo-Japanese alliance is not in the words of the text of the treaty which evidences its outward existence to the world. In those words no ingenuity can discover any danger to us. The danger is disclosed only by an observation of the inevitable consequences of the treaty in practice and in action.

Mr. President, in action perhaps our friends fear the Anglo-Japanese alliance because we are not parties to it. For precisely that same reason every nation which is not a party to the four-power treaty and which has possessions in any place near the region of the Pacific will fear the four-power treaty, will suspect the four-power treaty, will in time hate the four-power treaty. I do not need to enumerate those nations which are not parties or those particular dangers which may arise because certain nations are not parties to the four-power treaty. That, I think, has been covered; I am looking at it now from another angle. I have been talking thus far from the standpoint of the arguments which are made by the proponents of the treaty; but look now at what this alliance for peace has done in the past.

Look now upon what the partners in this alliance for peace under it have accomplished during the time of its existence. I dwelt the other day very briefly, and I merely reiterate it now, upon the fact that the alliance between Great Britain and Japan in 1902 originally was formed not only for peace but to maintain the territorial integrity of China and to maintain the independence and territorial integrity of Korea. I recall to you historically that under this alliance and while that agreement for peace, not only for peace but for the consolidation of peace and for the general peace, existed between those two great nations, Korea was cruelly and ruthlessly destroyed as an independent sovereignty and taken by Japan, and Korea is now brutally oppressed and the oppression, the cruelty, the national destruction were all accomplished under the great pact for peace, the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Under this treaty's mantle China was invaded, and yet to-day that invasion continues, and Japan holds large parts of China. So historically you can understand what a pact for peace may mean, a pact for peace such as the Anglo-Japanese alliance, into which, in the words of Lloyd-George, we have now become merged.

I do not care whether it be called an alliance or whether it be called something else. I will not waste my time in debating whether the treaty comes within the definition of Bouvier or the Standard Dictionary or not. It is not the name that is important. The question is, what are we let in for? We know what we have been let in for by what has occurred under the instrument to which we succeed, the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

Mr. President, a very distinguished Englishman recently attended the conference and was a part of it. After the adoption of the four-power treaty he was asked, "What do you think, sir, the four-power treaty means?" He replied, "It enables Great Britain to commit bigamy." I do not know what it enables us to do. God only can tell what it has let us in for.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, we were told a couple of days ago by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that Holland had been satisfied on the subject of her having been excluded from the peace conference and from the four-power treaty. The Senator said that our Government had addressed a note to Holland, and that Holland had expressed her content with her position.

Mr. President, the fact that Holland was left out is profoundly significant as to the meaning of the treaty. The Dutch control 47,000,000 people in the Pacific, near the Equator. France controls comparatively few. Her possessions there are almost, if not quite, negligible. In comparison with those of Holland, they are trivial. Yet France was brought to the conference, although she was not named in the resolution which the Senate addressed to the President, and Holland was left out—Holland, who had a greater moral right to be invited.

Why was France brought in? It was because she has the largest standing army now in the world. She has 700,000 white soldiers on the Continent of Europe, and she has 5,000,000 black soldiers on the Continent of Africa. England needs those soldiers to supplement the power of her fleet. England has no great standing army, and never has had one. Ever since the days of Queen Elizabeth, who broke the power of the Spanish navy, England has been the mistress of the seas; and, in order to advance her empire, it has only been necessary for her to secure the service of the troops of other countries. She has always been able to do it. With her money she has hired armies for the last 200 years. Beginning with the period of the French Revolution, for instance, she hired army after army from the kings on the Continent, to make war upon the democracy of France and to deny the French people the right to choose their own form of government and their own ruler. She spent four thousand million dollars in the 20 years' war against France, during which she hired the troops of the Czar of Russia, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of Austria.

Holland has never had any trouble with her colonies. France has had very little. England has always had trouble with her colonies, beginning with her troubles with us when we were the American colonies. Because of the fact that Holland has no trouble with her colonials, she has not had to maintain a large fleet or a large army. Consequently she was of no value as an ally to Japan and to Great Britain in the region of the Pacific. She had no military strength to contribute. Therefore she was left out and France was brought in, although not named by the Senate, because she has military power which England and Japan will need. Is there any escape from that conclusion?

The Senator from Alabama said that Holland replied that she was content. What other reply could she have made? She had to be content or array against her the most powerful nations on earth. She yielded because she had to. There was nothing else to do.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] grew eloquent as he described the thousands of people who passed reverently by the casket of our heroic soldier-dead here a year ago. He spoke of what our soldiers died for. Did they die for a thing like this? What were they told they were dying for? They were told they were dying for the highest ideals of the human race. They were told they were crusaders in the cause of right and justice. They were told that they were fighting in order to give to weak peoples the right for the same freedom that the strong peoples enjoyed. They were told that if they won the war, as we confidently believed they would, the conscience of the world would be organized, and this conscience would hereafter rule the destinies of mankind.

Mr. President, it was a thrilling spectacle to see those thousands of people pay honor to their loved and lost, the brave men who had given their lives, as they believed, to lift the world to a higher and better plane. But, sir, it had not been so very long before that there was another inspiring spectacle, when 16,000,000 American voters marched to the polls to express their intention to hold in perpetuity the absolute independence which their forefathers had won with the musket and the sword. Let us wait a little while. November will come again, and you will again see those millions of American voters marching to the polls to cast a ballot in favor of the maintenance of the liberties which we won on the battle fields of the Revolutionary War.

I do not know what irresistible power is behind the Senate. I do not know why every administration measure goes through, almost without debate, when those measures are different from what the people expected. You praise your soldier boys, but you kill the bonus bill. You will have to answer for that, too, in my judgment. You praise the soldier boys, but you are surrendering the victory they won.

Mr. President, what is this powerful influence, unseen but felt, which prostrates the opposition? Senators on the other side of the Chamber do not care to hear debate—at least only a few of them do. The other side obey orders. Talk about rubber stamps! We heard a good deal about rubber stamps when President Wilson was in office. Could he use his rubber stamps with more facility than President Harding uses his?

In my judgment, it is the money power that is behind this treaty and the Yap treaty. In the Yap treaty we were made to consent to the vast spoliation of Japan and impliedly to that of Great Britain. Now, having vested them with those rights, we guarantee to them under the four-power pact that they shall hold what they took by the good old plan of force.

Senators say that this does not bind us to anything. Does any man here, or throughout the country, believe that a lawyer like Elihu Root, the attorney for the Anglo-Japanese pact, would surrender that pact unless he was getting for his clients a far better contract? This is the work of Elihu Root. What is Mr. Root's record? It is that of a great corporation lawyer, the lawyer of international bankers, the lawyer of predatory corporations, the lawyer who can tell financiers how to commit felony and keep out of the penitentiary; the lawyer of Boss Tweed, who had to flee from his country; and it would have been for his country's good if his lawyer had gone with him; the lawyer of the Ryans and the Belmonts; the lawyer who could screen the men who stole the traction companies of New York.

Was not he also the lawyer representing the international bankers at Paris? Do you remember what his attitude was with reference to the League of Nations?

Why should he have been chosen to represent this Government at that peace conference where we had so little to gain and so much to lose? We started in for disarmament; we had no thought of such a pact as this. The cry of peace was heard throughout the land, and the propagandists in the churches and in the schools, who are trying to influence the Senate by their letters, their telegrams, and their petitions, have been made to believe that this pact means peace.

Mr. President, when Elihu Root was Secretary of State he was a party to Japan's rape of Korea. By the treaty to which I referred a few days ago we were pledged, from 1882 on down, to use our good offices in behalf of Korea if her sovereignty were threatened. Instead of that, what did we do? Russia and Russian capitalists were invading Manchuria and threatening Korea, and Japan convinced the Korean Emperor that Korean interests were at stake and that Russia meant to seize her territory. Therefore, with their wonderful powers of persuasion, Japan secured an alliance with Korea by which Japanese troops were allowed to land peacefully on the soil of Korea, and thus establish a base for land operations, without which Japan could not have won the war against Russia. Korea turned over to Japan her railroad lines and her telegraphs, and without these Japan's troops could not have been transported and directed.

Russia, waging war thousands of miles away from her base of supplies, with only one line of railroad on which to transport food, munitions, clothing, and men, was at a fearful disadvantage. I remember that an experienced officer of the Union Army told me in New York that Russia would lose the war, because she had only the one railroad, a prediction which soon came true.

Mind you, now, Senators, Korea gave to Japan indispensable help in the war, and immediately afterwards, instead of showing gratitude, Japan laid her plans to seize her ally; and those plans she put into effect. The Emperor and his minister were importuned, day after day, to agree to certain concessions to Japan. The Emperor refused and the minister refused. The minister was taken into a private room and, behind closed doors, a sword was drawn upon him and his life was threatened. He still refused to yield. They left him there under guard, went to the Emperor, made such threats against him, and used such harshness with him that he, in fear of his life, under duress, signed the document which they wanted him to sign. Immediately upon his release he sent a messenger to our State Department repudiating his enforced signature. Mr. Hulbert was the messenger and Elihu Root was Secretary of State. Mr. Root refused to see either the Korean minister or Mr. Hulbert. Day after day that messenger waited and knocked at Elihu Root's door, and not until Mr. Root knew what had happened in Seoul would he receive the message from the Emperor of Korea. When the minister delivered his message, Mr. Root said, "It comes too late to be seriously considered." He had waited for it to come too late, and was thereby an accomplice in the violation of a treaty to which our national honor was pledged. That is how Korea fell the victim of Japan.

Talk about taking the word of Japan for anything! In a speech delivered here in the Senate on October 13, 1919, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] quoted paragraph after paragraph of the various treaties in which the independence and sovereignty of Korea had been guaranteed by Russia, by England, by Japan. It is the most startling chapter of deliberate perfidy and wanton bad faith that history can present.

From page 6813 of the RECORD, quoting from the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, I read as follows:

On January 30, 1902, England and Japan made a treaty, and the preamble says:

The Governments of Great Britain and Japan, actuated purely by a desire to maintain the status quo and general peace in the extreme East, being moreover especially interested in maintaining the territorial integrity of the Empire of China and the Empire of Korea, and in securing equal opportunities in those countries for the commerce and industry of all the nations, hereby agree—

In 1902 Great Britain and Japan were actuated by a desire to maintain the integrity of China and Korea, one of which has been swallowed and the other sliced to pieces—

Article 1. The high contracting parties, having mutually recognized the independence of China and Korea, declare themselves to be entirely uninfluenced by any aggressive tendencies in either country.

Bad faith! That of Benedict Arnold would almost whiten like snow by comparison. The same pledge was repeated year after year. It was made again in 1904, and then again in 1905. If ever there was a country whose independence would seem to be thoroughly secure it was that of Korea, and equally secure, so far as paper pledges could secure it, was the integrity of China; but now Korea is gone, and China has lost in Manchuria; she is losing in Mongolia; and so long as the 21 demands of Japan or any part of them bind her, she can not call herself a free nation; she does not possess her own soul. No nation that submits to 21 or any other number of demands from another nation can still say it is independent.

Mr. President, I do not think very strange of it that a man should change his mind, especially if he is a young man, immature, insufficiently posted as to the facts; but when a man of my age, or the age of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], changes his opinion upon a vital subject, it seems to me he might give his reasons for it, and give them in such terms as all can understand.

Many, many years ago—I will not say how many, because it might not be pleasant to him—the senior Senator from Massachusetts wrote a biography of George Washington, the best biography in American literature. In 1920 he got out a new edition, and in April, 1920, he wrote the preface to it; and in that preface he stands by the George Washington doctrine of "no entangling alliances with any foreign country" as strongly as Alexander Hamilton wrote it for Washington, in Washington's Farewell Address. It is amazing—in 1920, mind you; not quite two years ago. Let me read you a little of it. He writes so well, and I am beginning to believe that he can write as well on one side of a subject as he can on the other.

The peace with Germany has now brought before the country more vividly than ever before another of Washington's cardinal doctrines, and the conflict which has arisen over the League of Nations has turned very largely upon whether we should abandon or maintain the principles stated by Washington in his Farewell Address.

That sounds familiar. At that time the world was ringing with the Lodge reservations and the Lodge speeches in the Senate.

Washington never tried to hide his meaning.

What a pity that his example has not always been followed, especially by the gentleman who wrote his biography!

And the principles laid down in the Farewell Address, as well as in many letters quoted in the last chapter of this biography, which likewise display his intense Americanism in regard to our relations with other countries, are so plain that he who runs may read.

That is a good deal more than could be said of this four-power pact. On the other side they run but do not read; and they differ about this pact. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] said it was an association of nations, and he said it several times, in a speech which he had carefully written out. Presumably he wrote it. Afterwards came the speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER]. He read it, and presumably he wrote it. In that speech he said distinctly that this four-power treaty was an alliance which bound us to confer. I asked him to explain to the Senate how a mere conversation, a mere conference, could stop the aggressions of an outside power on one of these four, and he said that when we both got to heaven we would find out. The information, of course, will be a little too late to be of service in this debate. Then came the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to-day. In his speech, which was ably supported by dictionaries, he said that there was no alliance. So the brethren on the other side of the aisle are very much at odds as to what this compact means, it not being one that "he who runs may read."

The balance of Senator LODGE'S preface to his book, written less than two years ago, is to the same effect. He has changed. Why? He has not told us.

I ask to have the remainder of the preface printed as a part of my remarks, without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Washington advised against all permanent alliances, drawing a careful distinction between permanent alliances and the temporary exceptions brought forth by some compelling emergency. He said: "It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world;" and, further, "taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments in a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies." This exactly covered the case of our engaging in the war with Germany. From this declaration of Washington came as a corollary the Monroe doctrine. Jefferson, in his first inaugural, in his warning against entangling alliances, expressed the same thought, but in a general way and with a qualifying adjective which left an uncertainty of definition, as qualifying adjectives generally do, which was wholly absent from Washington's declaration. The principles, however, then laid down by Washington have been the guiding star of the policy of the United States from the day when Washington announced them down to the present time. The covenant of the League of Nations, which is, in fact, an alliance, involved a complete departure from the Washington policy, and on that the controversy of the last two years has turned. Those who desired abandonment of the Washington doctrine could not meet it as a general proposition with any effective argument; they therefore adopted the plan of belittling it. They said that Washington lived a long time ago, which, comparatively speaking, is quite true. This, however, was not Washington's fault, and I should think anyone capable of reflection who looks out upon the world as it is to-day would hesitate to say that it was his misfortune. There seemed to be no other point made, and the only new feature was that I have heard Washington patronized by those who advocated the League of Nations. It is, of course, possible to say that Washington's doctrines do not fit a situation which has arisen 120 years later; but I confess to an emotion of surprise that anyone could be found who would patronize Washington and ask a great audience not to laugh at him, which the great audience had not the slightest intention of doing. Washington's principles did not rest upon physical conditions which have changed our environment by quickened methods of transportation or communication or by the development of the destructive forces of war. They were firmly founded upon a profound knowledge of human nature, and if they were sound when the eighteenth century was closing they are just as sound at the beginning of the twentieth century.

I mention these two examples, one domestic and the other foreign, of Washington's farseeing policies and calm wisdom—there are many others—because the circumstances of the time have made them very conspicuous and brought them sharply to public attention. There are but few very great men in history—and Washington was one of the greatest—whose declaration of principles and whose thoughts upon the policies of government have had such a continuous and unbroken influence as his have had upon a great people and through them upon the world. The criticism, the jeers, the patronizing and pitying sneer will all alike pass away into silence and be forgotten just as the coarse attacks which were made upon him in his lifetime have faded from the memory of men; but his fame, his character, his sagacity, and his ardent patriotism will remain and be familiar to all Americans who love their country. In the days of storm and stress, when the angry waves beat fiercely at the foot of the lofty tower which warns the mariner from the reefs that threaten wreck and destruction, far above the angry seas and in the midst of the roaring winds, the light which guides those who go down in ships to the haven where they would be shines out luminous through the darkness. To disregard that steady light would mean disaster and destruction to all to whom it points out the path of safety. So it is with the wisdom of Washington, which comes to us across the century as clear and shining as it was in the days when his love for his country and his passion for America gave forth their last message to generations yet unborn.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Again, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was asked, "Why vote against amendments or words which would make clear the meaning of this treaty if it is a peace treaty?" Mr. President, if it had been a compact for peace, there would have been no necessity for secrecy. There would have been no necessity for closed doors. When President Wilson was in Paris the cartoonists, the editorial writers, and the speakers blamed him, day after day, week after week, month after month, for the secrecy in which those proceedings were conducted. Those proceedings were no more secret than these. When President Wilson came from behind the locked doors he brought with him what would have been a new government of the world. In that government there was a balance wheel. I opposed it, and made a fight on it in the State of Georgia—it was almost the sole issue in my campaign—because I considered it a revolutionary change in our Government, upon which the people had not been consulted, and which could not be lawfully made by the Senate or by the President, or by both.

In this four-power pact, however, there is no balance wheel at all. Each nation has a vote, and the three can outvote the United States. Japan and France could deadlock Great Britain and our Republic. On the other hand, if three of them agree, we are powerless. We are in honor bound to abide by the vote if we ratify this treaty. We put ourselves in the power, whether you call it a conversation or a measure of these foreign countries; and if our people ever understand that, there will be thunders of protest against the proposed new arrangement.

Senators say that there is no pledge of action. What does the word "measures" mean? It is not synonymous with "conferences." It is not synonymous with "conversations." You first confer, and then you agree to adopt measures—to do what? To resist the aggressions of some outside power on one of these confederated powers.

Take an illustration. Russia attacks Japan. There is your aggression. Our contract would call upon us, in honor and in law, to confer with Japan and to adopt the best measures to repel the aggressions of Russia. How could she be repelled except by fleets and armies? What would be our contribution, except money or men or both?

Do the American people want another expeditionary force sent to another foreign country to fight the battles of Japan, of England, or of France? Even the mention of such a thing would stir a feeling of horror throughout the Union; but that is what this commits us to. We agree to confer as to the best means, the best measures, to repel from Great Britain or to repel from France or to repel from Japan the aggressions of some outside power.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am interested in the Senator's analysis of article 2 of the treaty which he is now discussing, and I shall be very glad if the Senator will, if he cares to, give further his views as to the meaning or proper interpretation to be placed upon these words. I will read all of the article, so that there may be no misunderstanding:

> If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

Assume, using the same illustration that the Senator has just used, that Russia should make an assault upon Japan and should seek to regain the northern half of Sakhalin Island, or should make war upon Japan, and a conference of the powers were called, and three of them—to wit, France, Great Britain, and Japan—recognizing that military measures would be needed if the aggression of Russia were to be met and successfully combated, should recommend that an exigency existed and that the most efficient measures to meet the aggressive action of Russia would be for all of the four powers to send their fleets and a certain number of men—say a million men—and to make contributions in proportion to the wealth of the respective nations. Does the Senator think that if that were the view of the three there would be any obligation upon the part of the United States to participate, assuming that our delegate or representative in the conference refused to take that view, although he conceded that unless troops were raised and ships sent and money raised Russia would triumph? What does the Senator think the obligation of the United States would be? How could it meet it? And when it became apparent that military measures were necessary to meet the aggressive action of Russia, if the United States failed to do anything and left the entire burden upon the other three powers, what does the Senator think would be the position of the United States, either juristically or in honor—morally?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, our allies could accuse us of Punic faith, of broken obligations, unquestionably.

A very great danger about this treaty is that a 12-month period is left after notice has been given that we want to retire from that companionship, from that alliance. We can not terminate the treaty at once. No matter how objectionable it may have become, no matter to what extent it may have involved us, we are still held by it for 12 months.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, that is 12 months after 10 years, is it not?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; 12 months after 10 years—precisely so—making it an 11-year compact, as I mentioned here the other day while the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was on the floor.

Mr. President, let us take a common-sense view of this. Let us assume a partnership between four men in a mercantile business, or any other kind of business—a sawmill, a banking business, a manufacturing industry, or anything else. Let them have just such a contract of partnership as this is. Let one of those partners notify the other three as follows: "I am dissatisfied with you. I am no longer willing to be associated with you, and I now give you notice that in 12 months from now I will withdraw from this copartnership."

What will be their attitude toward him at once? There will be embarrassing relations between him and the other three immediately. Those strained relations will soon grow into hostility, passive at first, and active later on, as that feeling develops. What will those three dissatisfied partners, now hostile to him, do to his interests in their firm during the next 12 months?

They will endeavor to dissipate his share of the profits, by bookkeeping or otherwise, and in 12 months they will be able to so diminish his share in their firm that when he comes to take out his part of the assets he will be able to take it away in a very small purse.

The Senator from Alabama says that they have always given us notice. I beg leave to differ from the Senator. There has never been any such notice given. There never was such a provision as this in a treaty. Such a provision was in the Versailles treaty, which was not ratified by the United States, but no treaty we have made ever had any such dangerous clause in it. If we serve notice on England, France, and Japan that we are discontented, and that we intend to leave them after the expiration of 12 months, immediately intrigue will start against us, and intrigues may be followed by hostile combinations; and by the time the 12 months will have expired we may be in actual warfare with those three, who will say, "We will not let you go. We will combine, and take others into the combination, and we will not let you go." Then will follow war, of course, and the worst of wars.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I do not do this in any controversial way, but I did not quite understand the reply of my friend from Georgia to the question which I propounded a moment ago. Let me assume that there is an aggression by a third power against one of the signatories to this treaty, and under article 2 the four powers meet together in consultation. Two of them determine that a certain line of conduct shall be followed in order to repel the aggression. The other two insist that a different policy shall be pursued in order to meet the aggressive movement of the outside power, and they can not come to any agreement whatever with respect to the steps to be taken to meet the aggression.

It would seem to me, I will say frankly, that none of the parties then could be charged with dishonor or with a violation of the treaty, if that impasse continued for an indefinite period, notwithstanding the fact that in the meantime the outside power was making headway in its aggressive movement against one of the parties to the treaty.

Let me suppose another case. Suppose the same outside power is carrying on this war, and when the four signatories to the treaty confer three of them agree that a certain course shall be pursued which calls for a united action upon the part of the four, calls for military operations, of course defensive in character. Suppose the fourth power is the United States and it refuses to assent to the adoption of any measure whatever. The situation obviously calls for the adoption of some efficient measures to meet the encroachment of the fifth power, but the United States stubbornly refuses to do anything. Our delegate confesses that the aggressive movement will eventuate in the subjugation of one of the parties to the treaty unless something is done to resist it, and yet he stubbornly refuses the assent of the United States to the adoption of any measures, weak or strong, to meet the aggressive movement. What does the Senator think the attitude of the United States would be? Would the United States in those circumstances be charged, and could it be charged, with a breach of the treaty, with a violation of a legal or of a moral obligation?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes, Mr. President; because the obligation to meet and confer is not a bit stronger than the obligation to agree upon measures. We are as strongly bound to adopt measures to repel the aggression as we are bound to hold a conference. You can not separate the two obligations. They are linked together in the same sentence, and the same construction applies to both. That being so, Mr. President, I repeat, in order that it may be thoroughly understood throughout the country, it is a mere quibble to say that we are bound to meet and confer, but are not bound to adopt measures to repel the aggression. The one obligation is as clear, as positive, and as binding in law and in honor as the other.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that there is nothing said about force in the Monroe doctrine; there is no mention of force there; and yet the implication is undeniable that the United States will use force to carry it out.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is quite true, and I think there are many treaties which have led nations into war which did not use the word "force."

Coming back to the point of this notice, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] must have misunderstood me, or I must have misunderstood him. I repeat the assertion, that this very dangerous clause covering the 12 months' notice of the denunciation of the treaty before you can get rid of it, is a novelty, is not to be found in any other treaty I ever heard of, and I would be very glad to have the Senator cite me to one if he can.

Mr. President, did not everybody have an illustration, in the last war, of such a situation? Ever since 1882 Italy had been bound in the triple alliance, which was the crowning victory of Bismarck's diplomacy. She had been bound to Austria and to Germany. Yet when Germany and Austria plunged into this war and told Italy to come, Italy refused to come, and for months and months she wavered, listening to proposals on the one side and weighing them against proposals on the other.

Finally she accepted those of the Entente, and now that she has not gotton her share of the spoils there can be no doubt of her hostility to us, as well as to England and to France. She was bitterly disappointed about Fiume, and she was bitterly disappointed about Smyrna, which was promised to her and then given to the Greeks. The Italians will not forget or forgive, and the time will come when Italy might welcome an offer to join an alliance against us, against England, and against France.

Mr. President, take the case of the famous treaty between France and England of 1802, the peace of Amiens. Did England give France any notice that she was going into war again? Not the slightest. She threw down the obligations of the treaty, struck France, and continued to strike her, until the general peace of 1815. I could cite any number of treaties where no notice was given. I can not cite a single one where any notice was given, and I would welcome the information if any Senator here will supply my deficiency.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] accuses us who oppose the treaty of partisanship. I wonder where patriotism would come in? There is no partisanship in our opposition. Those of us who are standing by the very doctrine which the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was standing for less than two years ago, and for which this Government has stood ever since its foundation, surely are not guilty of acting from partisan motives. Surely, that might be called patriotism.

Mr. President, it is hard to understand the apathy of Senators as this revolution is taking place. It is a revolution which entirely changes our relationship with ourselves and the outside world. As I said earlier in the day, if four men go into any combination with one another, so far as the scope of their contract goes there is no freedom of action for the individual. He must go with his copartners; he must go with those to whom he has pledged his faith. He has not the liberty of action he had before he surrendered it and went into that combination.

How can anybody say that we will preserve our complete freedom of action, our complete freedom of motion, of deciding our own fate, after we shall have ratified this treaty?

Not long will you be able to disguise this from the American people. It will not be long before they will see just what it is.

When foreign complications arise which call for our money and our men, curses loud and lasting will visit the memory of everyone responsible for this surrender of the independence of which we have always been so proud.

What sort of speeches will orators make on the Fourth of July hereafter? Spread-eagleism will be out of date. You will have caged your eagle. He will not have the freedom to look into the eyes of the sun and beat the heavens with perfectly free wings. Ah, no.

What will North Carolina think about this, she who at Mecklenburg was the first to declare for independence? What will South Carolina think when she remembers the perfect independence and freedom of action won in part on her soil, which was drenched with her blood, soil upon which the Swamp Fox—Marion—and the Gamecock—Sumter—fought year after year for the independence which has been her proudest heritage?

Would that Patrick Henry were here, that he might rise and cry again, "I know not what course others may pursue, but as for me give me liberty or give me death." I wonder what the brave farmers who fought at Lexington and at Bunker Hill would say if they could be here and read this preface written less than two years ago, and then read the votes which the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has cast, and will cast, in this matter of surrendering our hard-won independence?

I can see brave Nathan Hale, standing before the gallows upon which he was soon to perish, saying, "I regret only that I have but one life to give for my country." I can see the ragged army at Valley Forge, shivering, hungry, almost despairing, before Georgia and Carolina send them clothing and hundreds of barrels of rice to keep them alive. I can see those volunteers of the southern valleys riding night and day to round up Ferguson on Kings Mountain and to win the turning-point battle of the Revolutionary War. I can see Cornwallis delivering the sword to Washington, which now we are handing back to the descendants of Cornwallis.

I do not deceive myself at all about this treaty, I think, and I feel profoundly about it. My heart sinks in grief, and my soul with discouragement, as I see a heritage like this surrendered in order to get rid of an Anglo-Japanese alliance. What have we to fear from any alliance between Japan and Great Britain? It has been in existence for years. Are we to tell the country that we are afraid of them? God forbid. We are so magnificently situated that we do not need any such alliance as this. Let us treat Canada right, let us treat Mexico right, let us treat Central and South America right, and bring the New World into a position of unity and power which will defy anything the Old World can bring against them. That is the American policy, so far as I can think it out.

There was a time when the allied kings of Europe threatened our independence, and a southern President virtually said, "You have run over Spain and you have trampled Italy, but don't you dare to put a foot on this side of the ocean," and they did not dare to do it. Thereafter, when the Emperor Napoleon III set a Hapsburg on the throne of Mexico, supported by French bayonets, this Government waited until the Civil War was over and then notified the French to get out, and they got out.

Afraid of Europe? Since when? Afraid of Japan? Since when and why? Ah, Mr. President, I know to what goal this is all tending. The international banker, the manufacturer, the trust, want to exploit all the vast regions of undeveloped resources in the east. There is no doubt in my mind that one of the first results of this four-power treaty will be the cancellation of the debt which Europe owes us, $11,000,000,000. The little children here in America put up some of that money. The little boys of this country put up some of that money. The clerks, the typewriters, the very bellboys, the farmer, the merchant, the mechanic, the carpenter, the common people put up most of that money, and they are paying the interest on those European bonds, which Europe refuses to pay. Why has it been held back? Because, after they propaganda us into this treaty they will propaganda us into canceling their debt. You need not doubt that for one moment.

Is not Elihu Root the counsel for these international bankers? Is not he the lawyer of J. P. Morgan & Co., the Rothschilds, and all that great interlocking system of bankers? Did not Sir Robert Horne, chancellor of the British exchequer, say the other day, March 11, that we must cancel that debt, and if we would cancel the $11,000,000,000 which Europe owes us they will give Germany credit for it on what Germany owes them; in other words, our people will pay Germany's reparations.

Who has been appointed on that foreign debt refunding commission? Mr. Mellon, the financial tool of Wall Street, the financial associate of J. P. Morgan, a man holding office in violation of the law. Somebody ought to arrest him and send him to the penitentiary. A man ought not to be allowed to violate the law so flagrantly and brazenly. What will he do for Mr. Morgan, and for himself incidentally? He will postpone our debt and get the first lien for his debt and then, when propaganda has done its work in schoolhouse, church, Kiwanis Club, and so on, we will agree to cancel. You can propaganda us into anything.

Mr. President, how did England get into India? How did she get into Egypt? Let us take Egypt first. She went into Egypt as the partner of France. France had gone first and dug the Suez Canal. French money had paid for it. The Khedive had a controlling share of the stock. France and the Khedive together controlled the canal. During the ministry of Disraeli he and the Rothschilds compelled the Khedive to sell his controlling share of the stock, and the English Government now has it. There she holds that waterway, without which there can be no outlet. She holds the great dam on the White Nile and is completing a great dam on the Blue Nile. She says she has given freedom to Egypt. How much freedom? They may wear the form of freedom, but they will not have the substance of it as long as England controls the Suez Canal on the one hand and these two great reservoirs on the other, because Egypt is the one country that depends upon a river, she having no rainfall at all.

England ousted France, took it all for herself, and now Egypt will be economically a slave to England, as long as she holds those dams and holds that canal.

How did England get into India? The banker and the merchant got concessions from native princes, and when they wanted more and could not get it, the British soldier was there backing the banker, just as our soldiers are backing the bankers in San Domingo and Nicaragua, and we will soon be doing in Peru and Salvador.

Perhaps the greatest speech in the English language is that in which Burke arraigns Warren Hastings, as Cicero arraigned Verres, for despoiling those subject peoples in India, as Verres had despoiled those in Sicily. India is beneath the yoke of Great Britain because of the penetration of those merchants, manufacturers, and money lenders. The flag and the soldier follow the pounds, shillings, and pence, just as the flag and the marines are following our American dollars.

Mr. President, one could talk on this subject by the day. I have about expressed what I wanted to say, however. We were asked, "Are other nations composed of liars, thieves, and murderers?" If Japan does not come up to just that, the books all lie about her, and so do the missionaries. Have there been more perfidies committed, murder on a vaster scale committed, than Great Britain has committed in India, and is committing now—greater cruelties than Japan has inflicted upon Korea, and is inflicting now?

We Christians had pledged our Christian faith to protect these Christians of Korea, but we would not even listen to them when they came here with their complaints to the peace conference. As to China, we pledged her our faith, and have broken it. We have allowed her to be mangled, slashed, sliced, robbed. Now we are asked to become the accomplices of the men who have committed these crimes. Why go into partnership with criminals whose hands are dripping with blood and whose garments are reeking with human gore?

Mr. President, if I could plead this case before the American people, I have no doubt whatever as to what the verdict would be; but our people are not learning the truth; there is a conspiracy of silence; there is a general misrepresentation of the facts. The good people have been made to believe that this pact means peace; it means anything else but peace. The other day after the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] had finished his masterful speech, I received a card from a lady who was out in the reception room. She turned out to be a Georgia lady who had recently been in South Carolina. She was accompanied by a lady from New York. She had been so powerfully impressed by the speech of the Senator from Missouri, the facts which he gave and which she then learned for the first time, that her eyes were dancing with indignation. She told me it was a shame the way they were misrepresenting the case down South in the churches, in the schoolhouses, and wherever they could spread their propaganda; she said it was a shame that the American people could not learn anything about this treaty unless they came here and took seats in the Senate gallery.

Yes; the proponents of the treaty will put it through, and then in November next the American people will put them through. It was said in Georgia that everybody wanted the League of Nations, but it turned out they did not. President Wilson said in Boston and New York that the American people wanted the league, but by a majority of 7,000,000 they said they did not. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] now says that the American people want this four-power pact. How does he know? When did the American people tell him so? In what way have they expressed themselves? What chance have they had to express themselves? They will not get any chance until November next. Then they will have it. The ides of March have come, but they have not passed. Watch out, you are going to catch it in November. Oh, yes. The places that now know you will never know you any more, except as you serve out your unexpired terms. You are going to go; you need not doubt it. The people will put you out and they will keep you out. Hereafter neither the Democratic Party nor the Republican Party will dare to change our form of government without consulting the people.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The roll will be called.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	Moses	Sheppard
Ball	Heflin	Nelson	Smith
Brandegee	Johnson	New	Spencer
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Sterling
Capper	Kellogg	Norris	Swanson
Colt	Keyes	Oddie	Townsend

Ernst	La Follette	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Lenroot	Poindexter	Warren
France	Lodge	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Hale	McKellar	Rawson	Williams
Harris	McNary	Robinson	Willis

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the following Senators are detained from the Senate in attendance upon the Committee on Finance:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

CLAIMS OF HOBOKEN, N. J.

Mr. EDGE. As in legislative session, I ask to have Senate resolution 254, which was submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] for my colleague [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and which was ordered to lie on the table, referred to the Committee on Commerce for consideration by that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be so referred.

PUBLIC-LAND ENTRIES BY DISABLED EX-SOLDIERS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys relating to disabled veterans. It is House bill 9633.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill the title of which will be read by the Secretary for the information of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 9633) to extend the provisions of section 2305, Revised Statutes, and of the act of September 29, 1919, to those discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and subsequently awarded compensation or treated for wounds received or disability incurred in line of duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, with an amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that the purpose of the bill is simply this: Under the existing law a soldier discharged from the Army on account of permanent disability is entitled to make final proof upon a land entry made by him without further residence or cultivation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that refers to some application made before he became thus wounded, I presume?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. He enters the Army, having made an entry, and then is discharged for disability, so that he can not go back and cultivate. We have already taken care of that man. We have excused him from further residence and cultivation. The amendment is intended to reach the man who was not discharged for disability, but who was discharged as in perfect health, but is afterwards awarded compensation on account of disability; and he is given the same privilege to complete his proof. It will be remembered that we passed an act which raised a presumption, in case of tuberculosis or psychoneurasthenic disease occurring within two years afterwards, that it was incurred during the service. By this bill we extend the same presumption as to the land entry if the award for disability occurs within three years of the date of discharge.

Mr. WARREN. It is simply a matter of allowing completion of his proof at the end of the time, notwithstanding he may not have been able to live on his claim?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; when awarded compensation for disability.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, line 9, after the word "subsequently" it is proposed to insert the words "and within three years from the date of discharge was."

Mr. LENROOT. Is it a long bill? I have not a copy of it before me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a short bill.

Mr. LENROOT. May the whole bill be read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill as proposed to be amended.

The READING CLERK. As proposed to be amended, the bill reads:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 2305, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of February 25, 1919 (40 Stat., p. 1161), so far as applicable to those discharged from the military or naval service because of wounds received or disability incurred therein, be, and the same are hereby, extended to those regularly discharged from such service and subsequently and within three years from the date of discharge was awarded compensation by the Government for wounds received or disability incurred in the line of duty.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act of September 29, 1919 (41 Stat., p. 288), entitled "An act to authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes," be, and they are hereby, extended to those who, after discharge from the military or naval service of the United States, are furnished treatment by the Government for wounds received or disability incurred in line of duty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I observe that the language is not apt. In the amendment proposed by the committee, I move that the word "who" be inserted between the word "and" and the word "within" in line 9, and that the word "were" be inserted in line 10 in lieu of the word "was," so that it will read:

And who within three years from the date of discharge were awarded compensation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, unless some Senator desires to speak further in regard to the treaty, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in closed executive session. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, March 18, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 17, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WALSH.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O blessed Lord, may we approach Thee in spirit and in truth. Thou hast called us out of the uncreated, out of the pregnant depths, and out of the whispering silence of Thy infinite nature. O, Thou art our everlasting Father and our God. Always keep us in touch with human relationships and human responsibilities. Let us have sight of commonplace duties, to commonplace things. Keep them before us—clear, high, and serious—day by day, and herein may we have our pride and our joy. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING REPORT ON THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 47.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 100,000 copies of the Report of the Special Mission on Investigation to the Philippine Islands to the Secretary of War, without the map but with the data on the Philippines preceding and accompanying such report, be, and the same is hereby, ordered printed as a public document, to be distributed as follows: Fifty-five thousand through the document room of the House, 35,000 through the document room of the Senate, 5,000 through the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House, and 5,000 through the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions of the Senate.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 8, strike out the words "fifty-five" and insert the words "sixty-five." Line 9, strike out the words "thirty-five" and insert the words "twenty-five."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. KIESS. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any estimate of the cost of printing this report?

Mr. KIESS. The report shows it.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the report has not been read and we have not it before us.

Mr. KIESS. The cost will be $2,328.45 for printing 100,000 copies.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the need of such a large number for use in the document room—65,000 and 25,000, respectively?

Mr. KIESS. In reply to the gentleman I will say that there has been a very large demand for these publications. Only a few copies of the report were printed by the War Department, and none have been available for Members of Congress. I have taken the question up with Mr. Grayson, of the document room, and he tells me that they have had many requests. A number of Members of Congress have brought the question to my attention as chairman of the Committee on Printing. I think for a report as important as this the number is not excessive.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, they are not to be distributed through the folding room, but through the document room.

Mr. KIESS. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman state any instance where such a large number of reports have been made available for distribution through the document room?

Mr. KIESS. The report of the International Joint Commission concerning the improvement of the St. Lawrence River was distributed through the document room.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was a report on a project which had universal interest throughout the country. This report has no interest except in certain localities.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin and to the House that there is a very widespread demand for this document. Of course, the report of Gen. Wood of his visit created a great deal of interest, but aside from that the relations of the United States with the Philippine Islands is being debated all over the United States in colleges and schools. The number named in the resolution will be really too small to satisfy the demand that is now existing for this report.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his committee have considered the question of having some of the reports placed at the disposal of Members through the folding room. Why was not that policy adopted instead of putting them in the document room to be appropriated by a few?

Mr. TOWNER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KIESS. I think we can arrange so that all Members will be supplied with what copies they need.

Mr. STAFFORD. By what method are you going to supply them to Members when you put them in the document room to be appropriated by a few Members?

Mr. KIESS. I think we can make satisfactory arrangements with those in charge of the document room.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I think I have had more call for the literature on the Philippine Islands than most anything else. Somebody has suggested that the Wood report gives only one side. Propaganda is going on all over the country for the independence of the Philippine Islands. I have no trouble in securing documents favorable to the independence of the Philippine Islands, and I think there is real need for the printing of this document.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I am much surprised at the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana that there is such a widespread demand for this document. I have been in Congress some 12 years, and the Philippine question has been before us all that time. There was great publicity given to the Wood-Forbes report by the War Department at the time it came out, and I have never received a single request for a copy of that report. I can not understand, Mr. Speaker, this widespread demand. Some time ago a committee of Filipinos appeared before the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House and made a report, which is in the hearings, and I have never known of any requests made by anyone for its publication. Mr. Speaker, I realize as one Member of the House our responsibility on this question. I feel that Congress ought to give it the consideration to which it is entitled. We have promised independence to the Philippines, and yet we are making slow progress in that direction. We all know, and every Member of this House knows, that the Army of the United States is not now and in my judgment never will be in favor of granting independence to the Philippines.

Whether or not the Filipinos are entitled to independence now is a question for the Congress to settle. I have visited the Philippines, and have seen splendid evidence of their ability to manage their own affairs. I realize that the Committee on Insular Affairs of this House is the one that should bring before us the information as to whether or not they are ready. I have the greatest respect for the gentleman from Iowa, who is chairman of that committee. I know that he is a thorough, sincere, earnest representative of the people and wants to do the right thing in regard to this question, and I would rather have a report from a committee of this House upon this question of whether or not the Filipinos are prepared for independence than I would to have the report of Gen. Wood and Mr. Forbes. Gen. Wood has been in the Army all his life.

The Army does not want the Filipinos given independence. Mr. Forbes served over there as governor general for a number of years and was succeeded by another gentleman as governor general. Their opinions differ. Gov. Gen. Harrison, who succeeded Mr. Forbes, reported in favor of independence of the Filipinos. Gov. Forbes did not. His views were different at the time he saw service there. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when the Congress of the United States ought to be brave enough to say whether the Filipinos are to be given their independence, and if so, when they are to be given it, and whether or not we are to be guided entirely by what Army officers say. [Applause.] Those who have been in the Philippines and know the situation and know the sentiment of the War Department know that they will never recommend the independence of the Filipinos because it is a splendid station for the Army and they want to go there and want to maintain a station there, and I feel the Committee on Insular Affairs should take up this question and seriously consider it and make a report to this House and not let us be advised solely by the report of Gov. Gen. Wood and former Gov. Gen. Forbes. I trust the information will come to us other than this information which we are about to print. I have no request for this information, and I represent a fairly intelligent constituency in the city of St. Louis, and we have high schools, colleges, and universities.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I have not a single request for this report. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's mind is satisfied if he had the power that he would give the Filipinos independence to-day?

Mr. DYER. That is not my statement, I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. I said in my remarks I am reasonably prepared to say they are entitled to independence to-day, but will accept gladly further information. I have been to the Philippines, as I have stated, and have seen them there and understand what they have been doing. They have organized a legislative body—a senate and a house—and there has been no criticism of their ability to transact business; but I say, Mr. Speaker, we ought to take up this question and decide for ourselves what the facts are, and not leave it entirely to a commission sent over there, composed as it was of two great Americans, very splendid gentlemen, but I am not satisfied to accept their judgment solely.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DYER. I will yield; certainly.

Mr. CANNON. First a Democrat and then a Republican and then a Democrat go over there, you know, and they come back with documents, statements, reports, and all that sort of thing. Unless somebody knows more than I do about the capacity of the Filipinos under existing circumstances for self-government, I think I would be glad indeed to be informed.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield just a minute——

Mr. KIESS. Just a minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for one additional minute.

Mr. DYER. I want the best information, Mr. Speaker, we can have, and my suggestion is merely that the Committee on Insular Affairs, which is charged in the first instance with the responsibility for this question, investigate it themselves.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can not they go ahead and investigate if they choose to do so?

Mr. DYER. They should do that and not ask that this report should be sent broadcast throughout the country. I do not know who wants it. I do not think that there is anybody who wants it; but if there be a demand for information, let us get first-hand information from a committee of this House, because we are charged with the responsibility and not the War Department.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield? Is not the gentleman's real objection that the information is one-sided?

Mr. DYER. Well, of course, the information comes from those gentlemen mentioned who say that the Filipinos are not prepared for independence, and I want the Committee on Insular Affairs——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What is the committee amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HUMPHREYS) there were—ayes 58, noes 9.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KIESS. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask why you do not distribute these through the folding room like ordinary documents?

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, we thought by distributing in this way that those people who are most interested could get a larger number.

Mr. GARNER. Who are these people?

Mr. KIESS. Well, Members of the House want them——

Mr. GARNER. If they are Members of the House they ought to be distributed through the folding room so that each Member of the House will have an opportunity to distribute them to his constituents.

From the way you are fixing this thing, a Member of the House will say, "I am very much interested; lend me 5,000 copies, and I will take them over to my office and send them out," and the first thing you know they will be exhausted. It seems to me if a man is particularly interested in this and another man is not, it is easy enough to assign them on assignments from one Member to another, as with ordinary documents. It seems curious to me. It is the first time I have seen a document like this distributed through the document room instead of the folding room.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I have not the floor. I merely wanted to know the reason for this; that is all.

Mr. MANN. Of course, if this is distributed through the folding room there would be a large proportion of them never used at all. That is not the case with the ordinary document.

Mr. GARNER. I have been told in the document room that it is the custom of some Members of Congress who are more energetic than others and desire to reach their constituents with every conceivable document on the face of the earth, whenever the document goes to the document room and it is not called for at an early date, they say, "Send it over and we will mail it to our people." That is perfectly satisfactory with a document they might not want to get copies of, but where it is a document that is of benefit to the schools, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and which this would probably be, it seems to me each Member of Congress ought to have his proportionate number.

Mr. MANN. Where people are interested and want the document, it is proper to put it through the document room. There is no use of printing a large number of these documents and eventually have them consigned to the waste-paper basket, as would be the case here. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] says he has no one in his district who wants the document. Why should we distribute only for his benefit that which he will not use? Why not give them to those who desire them, and, if more are desired, print more?

Mr. GARNER. There are probably 150 Members of the House present. I will venture the assertion now that you can not find 20 men in the House who have requests for this document, and yet you are printing 100,000 of them.

Mr. MANN. That statement will not go unchallenged. There are 20 men in this House that have already spoken to me about how to secure this document.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me two or three minutes?

Mr. FESS. I wish to say that there is a constant application from high schools for these things, where they wish to discuss Philippine independence.

Mr. GARNER. That kind of a request comes to everybody from those who are desirous of getting information for debate, and I think there would be requests for this particular report.

Mr. MANN. I said for this particular report.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me about two minutes?

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, so far as any discussion of the principle or the policy of Philippine independence is concerned, there is nothing whatever new in the Wood-Forbes report. The report, in so far as questions of principle or policy are concerned, might just as well have been written here in the United States before Gen. Wood and Mr. Forbes went over there. There are some facts stated in that report in regard to conditions that are somewhat new, though not very new. I do not think it will hurt anything to publish this report, because, after all, the Congress is going to finally decide this particular question of principle and policy, I reckon. There is some demand for it by debating societies in the public schools of the country and by persons who are making a study of this question; so that, the cost not being very large, I agreed some days ago with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that I should make no objection to its publication. I do not think it is a matter of very great consequence, with all deference to my friend from Texas, whether it is distributed through the folding room or the document room.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman; but the idea is in having 65,000 documents—the importance of printing that number of documents and then turning them over to one or two men or half a dozen men. It does not seem to me a reasonable thing to do. That is the only point I had about it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I took the floor more by reason of what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] said than anything else.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. KIESS. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, Gen. Wood went to the Philippines opposed to Philippine independence; Gov. Forbes went to the Philippines opposed to Philippine independence.

I believe the President of the United States to be opposed to Philippine independence. This document is not, in my opinion, going to affect the matter one way or the other.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. KING. As a matter of fact, can you not prove by this very report that the Filipinos ought to have their independence and are entitled to it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think from the report it could be proven; I think independent of the report it could be proven. Of course, I occupy an attitude about that, and have from the beginning. There never has been a day or an hour from the time we went in there that I was not only willing but anxious to grant Philippine independence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of ordering the previous question will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 266, nays 47, answered "present" 1, not voting 114, as follows:

The amount of the bill as passed by the Senate is $25,976,525. The amount of the bill as passed by the House is $25,321,584, an addition by the Senate of $654,941. The Senate has receded from amendments and amounts aggregating $407,800, and the House has receded from its disagreement to Senate amendments and amounts aggregating $247,141. The bill as agreed upon carries $25,568,725.

MILTON W. SHREVE,
E. C. HUTCHINSON,
W. B. OLIVER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has been very kind to us in the disposition of our appropriation bill covering the Departments of Commerce and Labor. Their amendments were few, and we very easily arrived at a settlement of all the matters where there was a difference between the managers of the House and of the Senate.

The amount of the bill as it passed the Senate was $25,976,525. The amount of the bill as passed by the House was $25,321,584. The amount added by the Senate to the House bill was $654,941, but the Senate has receded to the amount of $407,800, and the House has receded and agreed to an increase of $247,141. So the amount of the bill as agreed upon now is $25,568,725.

The principal items of the Senate recessions making up the $407,800 are as follows:

Promotion of commerce, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce	$70,000
Barnegat Light Station	100,000
Repairs to coast survey vessel	22,400
Commissioners of conciliation, Senate amendment added $50,000, of which they recede from	25,000
Regulating immigration, deficiency for 1922	150,000
Employment Service	25,000

The principal items to which the House agreed in the aggregate of $247,141 are as follows:

Contingent expenses, Department of Commerce	$30,200
Export industries, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce	65,000
Enforcement of wireless communication laws, Bureau of Navigation, radio broadcasting	50,000
Commissioners of conciliation	25,000
Children's Bureau, investigation of welfare of children and child life. (Number of positions at $2,000 and above is increased from 8 to 12.)	40,000
Women's Bureau, increased from $75,000 to $100,000. (Number of positions above $1,800 increased by adding one at $3,000, one at $2,500, three at $2,200 each.)	25,000

I will say that this first item of $30,200 was largely to cover the work of the Bureau of the Census, by reason of the fact that it now comes back to the department, having passed out of the lump-sum appropriations period.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice the Senate increased the salaries on the statutory roll of the Bureau of the Census in a number of instances, raising the salary of the chief clerk from $2,500, which has been carried for years and years, to $3,600, and the conferees have agreed upon the amount of $3,300.

We have chief clerks running through all the various departments at much less than this, in many instances where their work is much heavier. For instance, the chief clerk of The Adjutant General's office receives $2,750. Will the gentleman kindly inform the House for the guidance of other committees as to the policy which his subcommittee followed in arriving at the decision of fixing the salary of the chief clerk of the Bureau of the Census at $3,300?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes. That is a very simple proposition. The committee was confronted with this situation: In order to find some substantive law upon which we could base the estimates for the salaries we had to go back to the 1919 period. The lump-sum period, covering three years, did not provide for the continuation of salaries paid during that period. So we had to go back to the law of 1919, although it was working a great injustice. Now the position the gentleman refers to here paid $4,000 under the Census Bureau. We tried to work out an equitable solution regarding these salaries, and we fixed them as has been stated by the gentleman, and the Senate, going into it possibly more deeply than we did, came to the conclusion that we had fixed the salaries too low for the character of the work that was being done and in consideration of the pay that these men had been getting. It is a very material reduction now. Under the agreement we have come to it seems to be just, fair, and equitable.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, in prior decennial censuses the salary of the chief clerk was increased during the period of the actual census taking, but when that was over the salary went back to $2,500. Now if chief clerks of bureaus are going to receive $3,300, as is provided in the conference report, naturally the precedent of this high salary will be presented to other committees as a model in accordance with which the salaries of other chief clerks are to be increased.

Mr. SHREVE. Oh, no. I will say to the gentleman that it is hardly fair to go away back to the time that he speaks of to make comparisons, because the cost of living is very much greater now than it was even in 1919.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take, for instance, the chief clerk of The Adjutant General's office. He receives $2,750, and has been receiving it for years. His office force is much larger than the office force of the Bureau of the Census. If you are going to pay a salary of $3,300 to the chief clerk of the Bureau of the Census, naturally pressure will be brought to bear to raise the salary of the chief clerk of The Adjutant General's office to a like sum.

Mr. SHREVE. This is one item that the Senate was very insistent upon. They worked out the amendment, and were very urgent that it remain in the bill.

Export industries, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce: We have allowed an increase of $65,000. This item covers a number of commodity divisions that were not included in the bill, the technical study of which would materially aid the development of our foreign trade.

Enforcement of wireless communication laws, Bureau of Navigation: We have given them $50,000 for the reason that especially since the radio convention was held in Washington last year we find that the air is filled with radio messages. It is practically clogged. There is so much interference that it is absolutely necessary to establish more inspectors so that the work may be better regulated. So we gave them $50,000.

We gave the Commissioners of Conciliation an extra $25,000, feeling that they were entitled to it for the great work they are doing, a work that I will say has spread all over the United States. On making a careful analysis of their work we find that they are about 90 per cent successful, so we gave them $25,000 extra.

Children's Bureau: For the investigation of the welfare of child life there is an addition of $40,000. The Woman's Bureau was given an increase of $25,000, and the number of positions above $1,800 was increased by adding one at $3,000, one at $2,500, and three at $2,200.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, amendment 43 in this bill increases the appropriation from $150,000 to $175,000 for conciliation work in the Department of Labor. I am thoroughly in accord with the appropriation, because we all know that there is much need for the conciliation service at this hour; and while I am not very hopeful that the conciliators employed under this provision can settle at this time the great industrial crisis that threatens the country, I am hopeful that eventually the efforts of the conciliators may bear good fruit.

I want to call your attention to the fact that we are slowly drifting into what I believe is going to be one of the greatest industrial struggles in the history of our country. On March 10, 1920, the operators and miners of the United States entered into a written contract, which was underwritten by the Government and made at the Government's solicitation, the terms of which agreement provide that prior to April 1, 1922, the miners' and operators' representatives should get together and have an interstate joint conference with a view of arriving at a settlement or agreement between them. The country was then led to believe that when the two years' agreement entered into at that time expired we were assured of the fact that the representatives of the operators' organization and representatives of the miners' organization would meet to discuss terms and eventually arrive at an agreement. The country looked forward to a fixed, peaceable, and satisfactory adjustment which would last for another period of two years.

Notwithstanding the interest of the Government seeing that the contract entered into with their approval is kept, and notwithstanding the fact that the prosperity and happiness of our people depend upon the continued operation of the coal mines and the employment of our 750,000 miners, the operators of Pennsylvania and southern Ohio have proclaimed that they will not meet the miners in conference, but are permitting the 1st of April and the expiration of the contract to come, knowing that a great nation-wide strike will prevail.

When we inquire into the motives of the men now refusing to enter into such a conference and in breaking their agreement, we can arrive only at the conclusion that their purposes are twofold: First, to break up miners' organizations if possible; and, second, by the strike or threat of the strike to boost the price of coal. I do not believe the operators in my own State are subject to the same criticism that the operators in some other portions of the Nation are. While I do not profess to be on the inside and to know always the motives prompting the officials of these two great organizations, I am convinced that the operators of my State are not now and for many years have not been adverse to dealing with the miners' organizations in entering into biyearly contracts. Our fellows have always been able to get together. Then the operator knows the price he must ask for his coal and would plan ahead for two years to come. I do not believe that the majority of the Indiana operators were in sympathy with the ruling of Judge Anderson, holding invalid the check-off provision in the joint agreement.

Our industrial life has become accustomed to the recognized contractual relations between the miners and operators, and to disrupt this relationship is to throw our business enterprises into confusion.

Propaganda, evidently coming from the operators who refuse to go into the conference, point to the high price of coal, with the intimation that the miner's wage is the cause of it. The miner gets $1.08 per ton for mining coal. It is estimated that the entire wage cost of producing a ton of coal is $1.97. Coal is selling for $10.50 per ton. Surely there are several hoggish profiteers between these two figures. Yet the country is led to believe that the miner is to be blamed for the high price of coal. It is time the force of the Government was brought to bear upon men responsible for the failure of the conference to meet. It is time that the public censure be placed where it belongs, and that our citizenship be aroused to indignantly protest against the continuance of this stubborn and unjustifiable refusal to try to get together, so that the public may have the coal essential to its future prosperity. I venture to say that if the miners would refuse to meet the operators in accordance with their agreement that not only all the power and threats of the Government but that the whole public would be aroused at the indifference of a set of people who would bring on industrial paralysis and strife at a time when we are trying to heal up wounds caused by the great world conflict.

I am glad to know that our President has expressed disappointment and impatience at the attitude of men who are willfully violating their agreement, and I believe that within a short time these contract breakers who are indifferent to the Nation's welfare will be told that they must in good faith keep the agreement they entered into and try to bring about a satisfactory solution of the distressing problem that confronts the Nation.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman has made the statement that the operators are refusing to meet the miners.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it not true that the operators have consented to meet the miners of their own States, but they are opposed to meeting the miners of other States?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. In one or two States they may be willing to meet the miners, but they are not willing to meet in other States.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is there any information showing that the operators do not have combinations running over State lines?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. They do have combinations, and I fear they have combinations for controlling the price of coal. We did have something of that kind in Indiana once, I believe.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If they have combinations operating nation wide, why should they refuse to meet the miners?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is for a twofold reason; one is to break the miners' union, which, if they did, would bring about chaos in the country, and the other is to boost the price of coal.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Did the gentleman say that the miners got $1.80 for mining coal?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. One dollar and eight cents.

Mr. EDMONDS. And that coal was selling for $10.40?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. We are selling coal at the mine for $1.80 to $2.50. That is the market price.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I say that the miner gets $1.08, and I can show you where they are selling it for $10.50 a ton.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman is not talking about the price at the mine. I am selling coal every day, and I know what the market price is.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is being said that the man that digs the coal is getting the profit? Somebody is getting a profit between the $1.08 and the $10.40. The operator would like to say that it is the coal miner that makes the price of coal high when it is not him at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman incorporate in his remarks the freight rates?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I have not them here. I am just informed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] that he is paying $15 a ton for coal here. This would be a good market for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to sell his coal in.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman may be correct about the pay of the miners, but I want to say that only yesterday, in the face of this strike in my own plant, we purchased coal for $2.35, Clearfield, Pa., coal, plus the freight. What the freight has got to do with the contract of the miners is beyond me.

Mr. STEVENSON. Only last week I paid $15 a ton for coal.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. What I am trying to make plain is that there is a high price paid by the public, and the enemies of the coal miners are pointing to the high price and saying it is because of the high price paid for digging it, when if you will look into it, instead of censuring the miners who are digging it we would place the blame upon the operators and the other profiteers who handle it and who get the difference between the $15 and the $1.08. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert a copy of that part of the agreement, referred to a moment ago, between the miners and operators which was entered into two years ago:

Resolved, That an interstate joint conference be held prior to April 1, 1922; the time and place for holding such meeting to be referred to a committee of two operators and two members from each State herein represented, together with the international officials of the United Mine Workers of America.

I also here insert a statement of the average wage of coal miners in the United States which is as accurate as it is possible to compute it:

	Average days worked for 1921.	Average annual earnings.
Pittsburgh district	123	$762
Ohio	118	550
Indiana	148	.....
Illinois	159	.....
Western Kentucky	.....	[1] 80
West Virginia	80	500

[1] Per month.

In Tennessee, approximately one-third of the miners worked one-third time, averaging $105 a month per man for the time they worked.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman's statement show also——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. One more minute.

Mr. SHREVE. I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the statement the gentleman will include show also the fact that the miners are only given part time; they have the right to work only a limited number of hours a limited number of days in a week?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes; that is very true. They only get about one-third time, but the statement I have included shows the number of days worked per year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

CHARLES C. COOMBS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. IRELAND. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 272.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Charles C. Coombs, son of Charles W. Coombs, late an employee of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to one year of his compensation as such employee, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the expenses of the funeral of said Charles W. Coombs.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Line 4, strike out the words "one year" and insert in lieu thereof "six months," so that the line as amended will read: "A sum equal to six months of his compensation as such employee.'

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

AUTHORIZATION TO VISIT MUSCLE SHOALS AND GORGAS, ALA.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration for a further privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 300.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and they are hereby, authorized to go to Muscle Shoals and Gorgas, Ala., for the purpose of taking evidence and making investigation regarding the advisability of the completion of the Government improvement for power purposes at those places, either by the Government itself or by some lessee or grantee, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page. The expenses of said investigation shall not exceed the sum of $2,000. All expenses of the committee incurred for any such purposes shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on the usual vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee and the chairman of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs, or requested, I believe, by a majority of the committee and sent to our committee for action. A similar committee for the same purposes, I believe, has been appointed for the Senate, and if it be desirable at all, it is desirable for the sake of economy that both committees act jointly and make this investigation at the same time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know when it is the purpose of the committee to go?

Mr. IRELAND. Well, I believe right away, or as soon as they can conveniently arrange it. There was an inquiry from the Senate side yesterday in making their arrangements to know whether this resolution had been favorably reported or not, and when it would be acted upon, so I imagine they are anxious to cooperate with a similar House committee in making their arrangements, and probably at an early date if possible.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know whether the full committee is going or a subcommittee?

Mr. IRELAND. I am unofficially informed they are not, that only a portion, but I can not give the individual members who expect to go.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will just yield for a statement.

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am very much in favor of the resolution——

Mr. IRELAND. I did not imagine it was going to meet with any opposition from that side.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The resolution ought to pass. If the committee feels it is necessary to visit there in order to make up their minds, I think they will derive satisfaction as well as information by visiting that property, and I hope that they will go at once. And if I may be permitted to say it, I hope that by the time they return they will be prepared to bring something before the House upon which the House can act. It is a matter of profoundest interest to a very great section of the country. Millions of dollars worth of Government property are standing there now idle that ought to be, it seems to many of us, in operation in some way.

Of course, there is a particular plan I am ready to support. But whether that plan is best or not, certainly the Committee on Military Affairs of the House ought to be prepared shortly to bring before this House some proposition that will give the House an opportunity to act. And let me say this further: I do not want to be unjust at all, but there is a fear—I will not say a suspicion, but there is a fear—upon the part of a very great many Members of the House and persons interested in that development that there is an unnecessary amount of delay that is going on in the Committee on Military Affairs on this proposition, as well as unnecessary delay in an executive department in submitting the matter to Congress.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he was conscious of the fact that this matter had been only a few weeks in the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs, and that ever since the matter has been before them they have been sitting daily in connection with it. The gentleman intimates there is delay on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I do not want to be offensive to the gentleman from New Jersey——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I know the gentleman does not want to be offensive, but I do not think criticism of that sort ought to be made of a committee of the House without grounds. The gentleman speaks of feeling aroused. Committees must do their duty, without regard to people who are talking on the outside.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield further to me—well, at any rate, I hope that this resolution will pass and that the committee will visit that property and that they will come back prepared to bring in a report upon which we can act, and bring it in quickly.

Mr. IRELAND. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE].

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs I simply wish to say that a very large majority of the members of our committee expressed a desire to visit Muscle Shoals. Personally, I am so tied up with other matters that I feel, probably, that it will be impossible for me to go; but I am not unmindful of the momentous question which is up for consideration by our committee, and, personally, I do not view it as a proposition to sell some surplus property belonging to the Government.

I think the duty of our committee and of this Congress is not to settle upon a price, whether it is $2,000,000 or $5,000,000 or $10,000,000, that shall come back to the Government, but it is to settle a great national policy, and so far as I am personally concerned, in the settlement of a great fundamental national policy, I do not feel it would do me any particular good to view the beautiful Tennessee River or magnificent structures down there. For one I am ready now to begin the consideration of the great question before this Congress. I want to say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that there has been no delay so far as our committee is concerned. We have been pressed by people who wanted to be heard and who are deeply and vitally interested in this question, and we have taken our time, under the leadership of our chairman, to get full and complete hearings, in the hope that we might be able to solve this most vexed question, and, when solved, that it will be solved right, not only to conserve the interests of the people of that locality but the interests of the people of all the country and still keep in line with the great fundamental principles and precedents of our country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERK, COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 284 (Rept. No. 807).

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House compensation at the rate of $3,200 per annum for the services of an additional clerk to the Committee on the Territories from January 9, 1922, until the end of the present Congress, in the discretion of the chairman of said committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? I am sorry my attention was diverted for a moment.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, you will all recall that some time ago a resolution was brought in here, which was knocked out on a point of order, having to do with taking care of the office of the late beloved and lamented Hawaiian Delegate, pending the election of a new Delegate from Hawaii. This resolution has been substituted for that. The clerk to the late Prince Kalanianaole has served unofficially under the direction of the chairman of the Committee on Territories ever since the death of the prince, which occurred early in January of this year, without any compensation whatsoever. This is to provide for that, as everyone realizes that the business of the Territory of Hawaii has to be carried on, and is voluminous; perhaps more voluminous than that of any other Representative in the House. The election will occur soon; and though this resolution provides for an additional clerk to the Committee on the Territories, the same clerk now attending to the affairs of the Hawaiian Islands, I am sure, will be that appointee and that the chairman of the Committee on the Territories will not retain him in that capacity longer than the election and qualification of the new Delegate from Hawaii. As soon as the Delegate is elected and reaches here and is qualified this resolution will terminate by the action of the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, in whose hands that authority lies.

Mr. MANN. Is there any time limit?

Mr. IRELAND. It provides for the remainder of this Congress, because we could not definitely set the time when the Delegate would arrive and be sworn in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for the War Department for the next fiscal year.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10871, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry as to how the time stands on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has 101 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Mississipi [Mr. SISSON] has 117 minutes remaining.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, in the remarkable career of that great American, Theodore Roosevelt, no one thing stands out more prominently than his unfaltering advocacy, in season and out of season, of the importance and urgency of national preparedness. If he were living to-day, I can well imagine his astonishment and disgust at the attitude of some of the leaders of his own party in so reducing the appropriations for the Army and Navy as to destroy the fighting efficiency of these arms of defense.

He would undoubtedly read with approval the sentiments expressed in an editorial which appeared in that stalwart Republican newspaper, the Boston Transcript, under date of March 3, 1922, a part of which I desire to read:

An example of the sordid folly that abounds in the record of the present House is its attitude toward our national defense. In defiance of the President, who to-day appears to have very little influence over the House, in wanton disregard of the recommendations and appeals of the strongest Cabinet that any President has assembled in 20 years, the so-called leaders of the House appear determined to outdo the record of Josephus Daniels as Secretary of the Navy and Newton D. Baker as Secretary of War. Little attention is paid either to Secretary Weeks or Secretary Denby. Their recommendations are either laughed at in committee or jeered at on the floor, and this despite the fact that both Mr. Weeks and Mr. Denby in the course of their public service have been Members of the House. But the so-called leaders of the House are equally indifferent to Secretary Hughes, and their indifference toward him is shown by their threat to torpedo the "treaty navy," provided for by the five-power treaty. This can easily be done by reducing the trained personnel of the Navy below 100,000, driving out of the Navy the entire corps of midshipmen at Annapolis, dismissing from one to two thousand commissioned officers, and refusing to appropriate enough money to enable the fleet to steam anywhere for any purpose. The fuel appropriation is already so nearly exhausted that about all the fleet can do is to limp home and tie up alongside our pork-barrel navy yards until the 1st of next July.

Our Army is to be reduced by 50,000 although the Executive has repeatedly declared that our military policy which Congress recently enacted into law must be abandoned if the Army is reduced below 150,000. But for the activity of the American Legion the present House would not have dreamed of keeping its pledges in regard to adjusted compensation. There is, however, another legion—the legion of average Americans—made up for the most part of the plain people of the land. They are becoming aroused to what is threatened at Washintgon. They did not vote according to party alignment during the war, and the experience in independent voting then and there developed has benefited them. They are quite competent to go into the Republican and Democratic primaries, in this and other States, and retire Republican or Democratic Senators or Congressmen who are now attempting to conspire against our national security and torpedo the "naval treaty." Failing to retire these gentlemen in the primaries and nominate in their places men of the character to keep their campaign pledges, men of the courage to scrap "pork-barrel" navy yards; and "pork-barrel" Army posts not needed by the Army and Navy before voting for wholesale dismissals in the trained personnel of either arm of the service, the plain people will have another opportunity at the polls next November—the opportunity to cast a vote of rebuke against the party in power, and to cast that vote in numbers sufficient to give us in the place of the present House a House led by men who in matters of foreign policy and national defense put their country before their party.

If the Republican organization here or elsewhere thinks that it can permit the Republican House at Washington to execute the threats now emanating from committee, and not be punished in the primaries and in the November elections, let them try it. The number of independent newspapers is much larger to-day than it was before the war, and every day witnesses an increase in the number of loyal Republicans and loyal Democrats who recognize the fact that there comes a time when true loyalty to party can best be expressed by voting for the other party. Such a time comes when our public servants forget that he serves his party best who serves his country best.

Rather harsh language but it expresses the feelings of thousands of patriotic Republicans everywhere. Now, what are the facts?

The Army of the United States was reorganized in 1920 and its personnel placed at 280,000, under what is known as the national defense act. The personnel was further reduced by appropriation acts until last year it had reached the minimum of 150,000 men. Now, in the interest of false economy, it is proposed in the present bill to reduce the number even further, although such a step is impossible without virtually nullifying the effectiveness of the national defense act.

The lessons learned in the late war are embodied in the defense act. Now it is proposed to forget these lessons, to turn our backs on all that was learned, and once more go back to the ill-conceived methods in use before 1917.

The missions of the Regular Army to-day are to teach the militia and the authorized reserves; to maintain what is known as overhead; to provide a mobile force available for duty here in this country or elsewhere in time of emergency; to guard the Mexican border; and to garrison our insular possessions.

The number needed for the purposes of instruction is roughly 8,000 enlisted men; for maintenance of overhead, 15,000 men; for our entire coast defense line, 8,000 men; for insular garrisons, 35,000; for duty at the Mexican border, 25,000; leaving for a mobile force only 59,000 men. We shall either have to abandon the well-thought-out plan which was made the law in the national defense act, get along with practically no mobile force at all, or appropriate enough to keep the Army's strength at 150,000, with 12,907 officers distributed as follows:

SUMMARY.

Part I	6,258
Part II	6,649

To reduce the personnel to 115,000 would, if we retain our plan, reduce this mobile force to less than 30,000 men, a force ridiculous for a nation having over 3,000,000 square miles of territory.

Mr. Chairman, there are in this country to-day over a million people, mostly aliens, who believe in overthrowing this Government by violence. The apostles of Lenin and Trotski, though not quite so noisy of late, are still at work. They frankly propose to organize what they term the proletariat to overthrow by force our existing Government. In Russia a mere handful succeeded with disastrous results in conquering by force a population nearly twice the size of ours. One machine gun properly handled will cow many hundred unarmed men. Not too long ago to be forgotten anarchists exploded a bomb in Wall Street and attempted to assassinate the Attorney General of the United States. But a few months since the miners of one section of the country, organized along military lines and well armed, marched across a State line in an attempt to unionize by force the miners of another region. Even with an Army of 150,000 these things happen. Under these circumstances is it safe to reduce our mobile force even from the point of view of internal trouble alone?

Since December, 1918, the enlisted personnel of the Navy has been reduced from 480,000 to 101,000 men, and we find that if the four-power and limitation of armaments treaties are ratified the ships allowed under those treaties will be undermanned if further reduction in enlisted men is permitted. It surely would be folly to keep our Navy at the maximum allowed under these treaties and at the same time fail to maintain its personnel at the figure most likely to give us a 100 per cent fighting force. If the plan for 96,000 men proposed by Secretary Denby is carried out, he estimates it will be possible to maintain efficiency and at the same time reduce the appropriations from $478,000,000 for this fiscal year to $350,000,000 for the next fiscal year, a saving of over $100,000,000.

I do not care to discuss at this time the merits of the acquisition of our insular possessions. However they may have come to us, they are ours for better or for worse. And having them and being unable to get rid of them if we wanted to, the burden is on us to afford them protection and the measure of protection which the experts of the Army and Navy deem necessary. They are a source of protection to continental United States if properly safeguarded. Especially is this so of the Hawaiian Islands, where it is essential to keep a garrison of at least 11,000 men.

Secretary Weeks, before the Appropriations Committee on February 20, 1922, in speaking of our insular possessions, testified:

* * * I look on the Hawaiian Islands as the point from which the defense of the Pacific coast should be made; that any expenditure in the protection of the Hawaiian Islands saves a vast amount of preparation of the Pacific coast.

Speaking of these possessions further, he said:

There is no reason to try to control these places unless we have enough men to protect the situation. There are 140,000 Japs in the Hawaiian Islands, almost half the population—forty-odd per cent. I do not know—whether there will ever be any trouble from that source, but it would be the height of imprudence not to have a material military force there, in my opinion. * * * I think the Hawaiian Islands are of as much importance to the protection of our west coast, from Alaska to Panama, as the island of Malta has been for the past 200 years and until recently to the British Nation in the Mediterranean.

Of course, nobody knows—

Secretary Weeks tells us that 25,000 men are needed all the time to patrol the Mexican border. Now, we do not want trouble with Mexico, either with the de facto government or with bands of roving revolutionists, bent on loot. But to prevent just such murders, loot, and arson as have taken place in the past along this border we owe the citizens of the United States, living in those States, in that section, absolute protection. That is what armies are for, and to protect its own is the first duty of a government. Perhaps we do not want to spend money to protect our own citizens on our own soil, but we have got to do it. Likewise, none of us likes to pay premiums on insurance, but for the protection of our loved ones we find it necessary.

Who can say when the next war will come? Is there a prophet among us who can name the day when wars will cease and who can say, "At last we shall have peace and no longer need armies and navies"? I am not an alarmist nor a militarist. I am not looking for trouble, but I do insist that we must not let our ideals for lasting and universal peace run away with our good judgment. As long as war is possible, prepared for it to the extent at least of having an efficient skeleton organization we must be, and in this preparation we must profit by the lessons our Army and Navy learned in the war and which are embodied in the recommendations of our military and naval experts. The comprehensive plan of national defense so capably prepared by them must be carried out, and to save a few millions of appropriations we must refuse to jeopardize the lives and property of our people. We know the need. May we have the patriotism to insist upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I can not begin the discussion of this bill without making my grateful acknowledgment to Mr. ANTHONY, the chairman of the subcommittee, who has had the bill in charge. For days, beginning at 10 o'clock in the morning and continuing until late in the evening, he has devoted all his energies to the drudgery of the investigations that this bill required. [Applause.] He has brought his knowledge of the Army, acquired from long service on the Military Affairs Committee, to aid him in making this investigation, and has been prompted solely by a desire to relieve the burdens of the taxpayers of this country without in any wise impairing the national defense. [Applause.] And I join with my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], in paying tribute to my Republican associates on the subcommittee, who, with Mr. ANTHONY, have rendered patriotic, faithful, and diligent service in making the necessary inquiries.

My colleague and Democratic leader [Mr. SISSON], for years a member of the Appropriations Committee, has long earned a reputation for stern economy in the expenditure of public money, which he has exemplified throughout the hearing on this bill.

The question of most interest which arises on this bill is the size of the Army, but the underlying principle involved is not of prime importance. For some years a controversy was waged whether or not the defense of this country should be mainly in a large standing Army or in the training of our citizen soldiers. Secretary Garrison at one time advocated a Regular Army of 500,000 men, and Secretary Baker, backed by Gen. March, an Army of 576,000 men. But this House has stood firmly against all propositions looking to a great Military Establishment. [Applause.]

In 1916 the national defense act committed this country to the policy of a small Regular Army, the military training of civilians, and the development and organization of our State Militia into the National Guard. In the amended act of 1920 the same general principle was insisted upon. Jefferson years ago advocated the same principle. In speaking of military training for the citizens, he wrote Col. Monroe, afterwards President: "This was the case with the Greeks and Romans, and must be that of every free State. Where there is no oppression there will be no pauper hirelings. We must train and classify the whole of our male citizens and make military instruction a part of collegiate education. We can never be safe until this is done."

And so it has become the fixed policy of this country that we are not going to have a huge standing Army in order to defend the country, but will depend upon the units that comprise the citizen soldiers of the country.

The size of the Army is determined not as the main reliance of our defense but by the requirement for garrison, police, and training service. There may be a variety of opinion as to the proper size, but no great principle is involved. Last year the War Department insisted that an army of 150,000 meant national disaster. The House, however, only provided for this number, and the Army has been reduced below 150,000 and is now only 139,000, and yet the country has suffered none of the foretold evils. A few weeks ago the Secretary of War testified before a subcommittee that the irreducible minimum was 150,000. If the committee should fix a smaller number he predicted the foundation of the Republic would crumble. And yet only to-day I see in the press reports that Secretary Weeks himself says that the country can get along with an Army of 130,000 men.

So that in a few weeks' time the Secretary of War has changed his view as to what should be the irreducible minimum size of the Standing Army of this country by 20,000 men. I agree that there is an irreducible minimum and I think this bill has reached it. If we do not have a sufficient number for garrison, police, and training service the money we do appropriate is in great part wasted. But what constitutes that minimum is a matter of simple investigation and arithmetic. It involves no great questions of policy. We propose in this bill an Army of 115,000 enlisted men and 11,000 commissioned personnel. I do not believe we could safely go below those figures. But that there could be any possible danger of a national disaster in coming to those figures can not be shown or demonstrated, according to my view. On the contrary, it plainly appears that, so far as garrison and police service is concerned, if the announced purposes of the War Department are carried out, we will have more men in this country than can possibly be required for such purposes. The men who will be brought home to this country from foreign services will place in continental America a larger permanent force than has ever existed.

The War Department has announced its purpose of bringing home from Germany 7,500 troops, and that 5,000 or 6,000 are to be brought from Hawaii, and that 4,000 or 5,000 troops or more will be brought from Panama, and 600 from China, and several thousand from the Philippines, so that we shall have in this country a stronger armed force than exists at present.

In passing, I regret to say that, under the rules of the House, the committee had to appropriate for the pay of the commissioned personnel according to the salaries fixed by the act of 1908. For my part, had I been free to do so, I would have been glad to have voted to continue the salaries now received by the Army officers. But the law fixing these salaries expires by limitation on June 30, 1922, and the salaries of 1908 automatically are reinstated. An appropriation committee can not consider matters of legislation, and we were perforce limited to the salaries fixed by law.

I understand the matter will be brought before the House by the proper committee. Owing to the advance in all matters affecting the cost of living, these salaries are grossly inadequate and unjust. This great and rich country should not subject the Army officer, who has charge of the defense of its wealth and prosperity, to the suffering, humiliation, and almost degradation of these wholly inadequate salaries.

But besides garrison and police service the Army furnishes the ready means for the instruction of the civilian reserve. The Army furnishes instructors in the schools and colleges, in the civilian training camps, in the Reserve Army Officers' Corps, and to the National Guard. The most important branch of the national defense is that furnished by the National Guard. The policy of the present bill to the National Guard is one of great importance. It should not be forgotten, however, that the National Guard organizations are State troops. Until taken into the service of the Federal Government they are not subject to Federal control. Each State provides for and controls its own National Guard. It is the national policy to aid in the training and development of the National Guard, but the National Guard is no part of the Army. Again, it should be remembered that the National Guards are civilians. They are men engaged in civilian life with military service only an incident.

The Army Staff has undertaken to organize the National Guard on a great national scale. The National Guard units can not organize to meet the requirement and needs of the State, but must organize to meet the requirements of this great national organization. A State may require a company of infantry, but it can not organize, if the Army Staff organization needs an ambulance corps. The result has been the organization of highly technical units for which the National Guard system is not adapted at any great expense to the National Treasury. Such units require the service of men who devote their whole time to the work. Thus, the National Guard has its units of infantry, its units of cavalry, its tank corps, its air service, its field artillery, organized on national lines into divisions, corps, and so forth. At present the strength of the National Guard is 142,000. Of these, 84,000 are infantry, 23,000 are field artillery, 4,446 are engineers. The air service is 607, the medical department 2,500, the antiair service 3,100, the cavalry 12,600, and the coast artillery 6,100.

The following table gives the respective cost of maintenance per man, which does not include the initial cost of $375 per man:

Cost of maintenance (exclusive of equipment) per year; and including armory drill pay, total camp expenses, animals and their forage and caretaking (animals only included for cavalry and horse-drawn artillery batteries), and general expenses.

The cost per man is $210 on the average, and the sum required to support the 142,000 men so organized is $30,000,000——

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Is it the idea of the committee to have some of these technical units demobilized?

Mr. HARRISON. We leave that to the States. The National Government really has no control of the National Guard. They are State troops. But the question comes up whether we are willing to go into the Federal Treasury to support these expensive units, which we consider unduly expensive, in view of the fact that the National Guard is only a temporary force. By temporary, I mean essentially composed of civilians.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HULL. On page 1304 of the hearings Gen. Rickards says he must have $30,000,000 to support the present National Guard.

Mr. HARRISON. I said so.

Mr. HULL. And you have appropriated only $20,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. We appropriate $21,000,000, and give them $11,000,000 of supplies in addition. And in Gen. Rickards's estimate of $30,000,000 required for 142,000 men there is an estimate for the support and maintenance of 8,000 horses that are eating their heads off the whole year round when they are for the use of civilians occasionally given to military training. An Army trooper takes care of his own horse, but for the horse of a civilian trooper there must be a caretaker paid for out of the national purse.

Mr. HULL. But 8,000 horses do not cost $9,000,000, and you have not provided for the armory drill and summer maneuvers of the National Guard. You have demobilized them.

Mr. HARRISON. You will find that the expense of each character of service is given in the hearings, as before stated by me, and that for infantry drill and for the necessary tank corps and field artillery the cost is $154 a man, but when you come to the question of taking care of the cavalry it is over $256 a man.

Mr. HULL. According to the testimony you do not expect all of the National Guard to have summer maneuvers?

Mr. HARRISON. We expect the National Guard to be taken care of. We do not cut them out entirely. We appropriate for 4,000 horses and furnish their artillery and furnish their cavalry; but the testimony of Gen. Rickards himself is that 12,000 cavalry are entirely out of proportion to the 84,000 infantry. And why should this Government, when these men are out for a few days' parade service each year, maintain the horses and caretakers for all the months that these men are not in the military service?

Mr. HULL. Then the committee must intend to demobilize some of these cavalry and artillery units?

Mr. HARRISON. We are not going to demobilize them. That is up to the States.

Mr. HULL. It is up to the Militia Bureau, and they must be guided by the appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. The States can demobilize them. They are State troops. We expect to keep within reasonable appropriations to make them effective if the Federal Government should ever need them; but certainly it is not in the interest of economy for the National Government to take charge of these National Guards and maintain the necessary equipment during the months that they are not in the military service.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion of this thing, and I would like to know, if the National Guard were disbanded and not considered an arm of the national defense, whether the 115,000 men in the Regular Army would be considered sufficient for the defense of the country?

Mr. HARRISON. The National Guard is of the greatest importance; but we can not enlist men in the National Guard. That is a matter that is done entirely by the States. They are merely supplementary adjuncts to the Regular Army, and as such citizen soldiery must be trained. That is the only possible excuse for this Government taking care of them.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Are they considered a worthy adjunct of the national defense?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, splendid, fine; but if you organize them into a regular army you might as well ask that they be put into the Regular Army.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Does the gentleman mean to say that we had better increase the Regular Army and disband the National Guard?

Mr. HARRISON. We do not disband them. As I say, it is a matter for the States.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. It amounts to the same thing if you do not appropriate for them.

Mr. HARRISON. I say, as I said in the beginning, that I believe the surest and best national defense is the National Guard, and I believe we ought to encourage the National Guard organization in every way, and furnish them the necessary drill; but there are certain expensive technical units in that National Guard that can well be left to the States more economically to be taken care of than by national appropriations.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I am very glad to have the gentleman make the statement that he believes the National Guard to be a valuable arm of defense, because I had a misconception of his opinion from his statement that the National Guard is only temporary.

Mr. HARRISON. They are not soldiers. They are citizens and business men. They have other daily occupations. But under the Army Staff regulations the cost is unreasonably increased by highly technical and expensive units not adapted to such a system.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Do the committee intend to encourage the National Guard to continue to develop?

Mr. HARRISON. We do.

Mr. HULL. Gen. Rickards, on page 1305, says that $30,000,000 will support the present National Guard and allow of no further development. You have given them an appropriation of $20,000,000 and then you say that you are encouraging the National Guard. Now how are you going to pay the National Guard?

Mr. HARRISON. If we should encourage the National Guard in accordance with the methods recommended by Gen. Rickards, we would have to increase the appropriations, as he himself stated, to $48,000,000. He says that $30,000,000 only keeps up the National Guard to what it is now. I again repeat what I have just stated, the cost of the National Guard is unduly swollen by attempting its organization into expensive and technical units.

Mr. HULL. You made a cut of $10,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The appropriation for 1921 gave them uniform supplies, and it was charged to the appropriation other than the Regular Army supplies. But we give them supplies estimated at $11,000,000, which are not charged against their appropriation.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. What is the difference between the appropriations in this bill and the last or current appropriation?

Mr. HARRISON. When the last appropriation was made we did not have as many troops, and this is in excess of last year. I do not remember the exact amount.

Mr. HULL. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HARRISON. I may be, but I think the National Guard is increased in numbers to 142,000, and last year I do not think we had more than 100,000. That is my recollection. Now, the average cost per man in the National Guard is $210 a year, without his equipment, and that is something about $375. So that we have appropriated for about the same amount that is asked for, $30,000,000, and we have provided that $21,000,000 of it shall be in money and the rest of it shall be in supplies from the surplus stores of the Army. Why should we go out and buy supplies which the Army already has? We furnish them support in the way of supplies rather than in the way of actual appropriation. I believe if the gentlemen of this committee will investigate, they will find that the appropriations in this bill will amply take care of the National Guard, because that was the desire of every member of this subcommittee, that they should be taken care of and amply taken care of. But why support 11,000 or 12,000 horses and these caretakers of the horses, which is an additional expense attached to the motorized field artillery, as it is called? All this additional amount and expense will naturally attach to this expensive unit when that matter can be more readily and economically left to the State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How many are there in the National Guard?

Mr. HARRISON. One hundred and forty-two thousand, of which 12,000 are cavalry.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The horses of the cavalry unit belong to the Government.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and they ask for 8,000 horses; they want 3,000 additional. We have provided in this bill for 4,000 horses which will take care of the units as they are now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is the policy of the Government to encourage the National Guard, is it not?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and all the way through we have endeavored to do it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think I agree to a large extent with the gentleman from Virginia in connection with the National Guard organization. But I want to ask this question, if he does not believe that when the Appropriation Committee undertakes to prescribe how the National Guard shall be organized by limitation, it is indirectly seeking to do what should be the province of the standing committee of the House, and that if that course is pursued by the Committee on Appropriations, what becomes of the other committee of the House?

Mr. HARRISON. If that was the case, the provision would be subject to a point of order, but we have kept within the limitation of the rules of the House by not making appropriations not within the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. HULL. A short time ago in answer to a question by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] the gentleman from Virginia said that the committee had increased the appropriation for the National Guard. I call the gentleman's particular attention to the fact that the committee has decreased it $4,400,000 and they have got 50,000 more to provide for.

Mr. HARRISON. I called the gentleman's attention to the fact that that was in money, that by making the appropriation in money and the balance in supplies we have increased the appropriation. Now, Mr. Chairman, my time is expiring and I want to say a few words on the other side. Under the present bill the enlisted strength of the Army is about what was its prewar strength. Indeed, with the additional units, such as air, tank, machine gun, which the war has made essential, the enlisted strength of the present bill is virtually less than prewar strength. It would be, in my opinion, however, a national calamity to permit the Army to drift back to prewar conditions. When the war broke out this country was woefully unprepared. We had only about 5,000 commissioned personnel, and it had to meet the exigencies of an Army of 4,000,000 men suddenly called to the colors. We barely had the necessary officers to drill the young men who were selected as emergency officers. Our splendidly educated officers, qualified for military service to take charge of the Army in time of battle, had to devote themselves to military drilling. Now, if we cut down the commissioned personnel you are coming dangerously near having the same conditions again. We do reduce the commissioned personnel 2,000, but that was necessary, in my judgment, in order to procure proper ratio between the different grades of officers. We have an Army of 139,000 men without a second lieutenant in it. We have colonels for an Army of 280,000, lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains, but when it comes to the essential officers to take charge of the line, the second lieutenants, we have actually no second lieutenants. Perhaps there may be 20. We should have all the second lieutenants the Army requires, and this perhaps is just as essential as having all the colonels an Army of 280,000 requires. The Secretary of War says that the law required the keeping of the colonels, and so forth, to the full authorized complement. If such is the case we correct it by changing the application of the money appropriated. The cut in the Army personnel is sufficient to make the proper correction.

We furnish officers to train in the schools and colleges, in Reserve Officers' Training Corps, in the civilian training camps, in the National Guard. All strictly in the line of suggestion of Thomas Jefferson.

If war comes we should have officers to meet the necessary expansion. Never again should we have to make drillmasters of our highly trained officers and send our raw recruits into battle under inexperienced and ill-trained officers which the emergency required. It is hard to estimate the loss of young American manhood due to the exigencies which our unpreparedness in the Great War entailed. We should never forget the lesson that the war calamity taught us. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanmous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, the American public, the American Legion, and the American Government are united in the opinion that the dependents of the soldier and the disabled and sick soldier shall have the best and most generous treatment that a grateful public can give.

For these there must be no limit in our appreciation. We can not pay our obligation in dollars alone. To Government aid must be added sympathetic and personal interest, the word of cheer, and entertainment.

Our provision for this class of our soldiers will be extended very largely; but there is another class which is not covered by the present law.

The report of the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, under date of March 1, 1922, shows 332,113 claims for compensation have been disallowed.

These claims are divided into two classes: First, claims for compensation due to disability numbering 230,758, and, second, claims for compensation due to the death of the ex-service men numbering 101,355.

In the first class claims were disallowed because in the main the soldier could not prove to the satisfaction of the bureau that his disability was the result of his service.

In a majority of these cases the bureau admits the man is disabled but decides that it is powerless under the law to recognize the disability as being of service origin because sufficient proof has not been submitted.

The second class is for compensation caused by the death of the ex-service man, for which applications are filed by the widows and dependent parents.

This class of claims has been denied because sufficient proof has not been filed to convince the bureau that the death was due to a disease or injury received while a member of the military or naval forces.

I am handling many hundreds of these claims. One of my secretaries devotes practically his whole time to such matters; and in many cases I can not agree with the findings of the bureau, and it is my custom to exhaust every means to procure a settlement before finally yielding to the decision of the bureau.

When we consider the veterans of the Indian wars, the Mexican War, the Civil War, and the Spanish War and the allowances made for pensions for widows and service pensions, amounting to $250,000,000.00 annually, it is but common justice to push with all energy the claims of the widows and dependents of the last war.

So in considering this new matter we find: Those who are clearly classified under the Veterans' Bureau; those who will come under the new adjusted compensation law when passed; but still a third class, which is already represented by 332,113 claims, which is not covered by any law.

The bill under consideration was intended to give to the ex-service man of the World War who does not come under the above classes an adjusted compensation, sometimes called a bonus.

Of the 4,500,000 ex-service men, approximately 1,000,000 presented a bill to Congress or expressed a desire which culminated in the preparation of a bill containing five elements:

First. A cash compensation;
Second. Paid-up insurance;
Third. Vocational training;
Fourth. Farm or home aid; and Fifth. Land-settlement aid.

The bill approved by the American Legion is not the one now submitted by the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Plan number one, submitted by the American Legion, which was variously estimated would be selected by from 75 to 95 per cent of the ex-soldiers, has been abandoned by the committee. Therefore it can not be said by anyone that the American Legion or its various post commanderies have indorsed the bill now under consideration. In fact, unless they have received a copy of the bill within the last few days, they have not even read it, and there has been no opportunity for indorsement.

The bill is opposed by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the comptroller, and is not approved by the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. It has so far not received the indorsement of a single high official.

Wherever the taxpayer has been heard from, it has been in opposition to the bill, and, unless the executive officers of the American Legion will personally assume the responsibility for indorsement of this new measure, it has been reported in opposition to the wishes of all the executive officers of the Government, of the taxpayer, and not in accordance with the desires of the American Legion.

An attempt will be made to present it under a rule which prohibits amendment and will limit debate to 20 minutes favorable discussion and 20 minutes opposition, when the bill itself could not even be read in a leisurely manner in 20 minutes.

The bill will pass the House, because it is the only bill presented for its consideration and because under the rule it can not be amended or changed.

Members are limited to a vote of approval or disapproval without opportunity for explanation or chance to amend in conformity with the wishes of what might be the majority of the House.

If President Harding does not change his express declaration he will veto the bill, unless it is radically changed in the Senate, the financial adviser of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Comptroller of Currency selected by him having both opposed it.

The impression may be temporarily created, for primary and election purposes, that the bill is to become a law, but there are few in the House who believe it will be passed in its present form by the Senate and that if it is passed it will receive the approval of the President.

It is equally certain that if the President does veto the bill, the House can not muster the necessary two-thirds vote to pass it over his veto; so that one of two things are quite obvious:

Either the President must back up and yield to the House, or the House must back up and yield to the President.

In the meantime the country is left in uncertainty and the wishes of the American Legion are made a football to be passed between the executive and legislative branches of our Government.

The subject naturally falls, in the matter of interest, into three subdivisions—the soldier, the taxpayer, and the Government—and I shall attempt to give the reasons why the bill will be unsatisfactory to all three.

THE SOLDIER.

The bill on its face proposes to pay for adjusted overseas service $1.25 a day, with a maximum limitation of $625; to pay for adjusted home service $1 a day, with a maximum of $500.

This looks good on its face, but the soldier, having computed his number of days' service and examined the benefits provided, will find that—

1. Only those men whose total compensation is $50 or less will receive cash. This means that the men who served the shortest time, had the least service, and made the fewest sacrifices will be the first paid, and the only ones who will be paid in full in cash.

2. The veteran, then, has his choice, and only one choice, of five different methods of payment: The first a 20-year insurance policy, payable in 1942, with a borrowing value of 50 per cent of its total if presented before September, 1925. If the veteran borrows and fails to pay back the loan, it will be forwarded by the bank to the Government and the balance will be held for him or his heirs for 20 years, or until the year 1942.

If he desires to borrow he must, under a plan yet to be devised by the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, make his note for 50 per cent of the amount due him, present it to some bank or trust company, be properly identified, present his note accompanied by his certificate, and then, if the bank desires to loan him the money (a matter which is entirely optional with the bank) he may, after identification and the presentation of his personal promissory note and the Government's certificate, borrow 50 per cent of his insurance policy. For this he must pay the then rate of interest charged on commercial paper, the only limitation being that the rate of interest shall not exceed by 2 per cent the rate of commercial paper on that date.

Of course, 10 different schemes will be devised, by way of commission for the inducement of expediting payment, to make this interest any amount which the institution or "go-between" may determine.

It is estimated that the average value of the paid-up insurance will be $325. This would give it a loan value of 50 per cent, or $162.50.

It must not be understood that each veteran will receive this amount. Approximately one-half of the amounts paid will be less than this, varying from $162.50 down to the $50, which amount and below which amount will be paid in cash.

This insurance feature will be accompanied by conditions, exceptions, bookkeeping, red tape, affidavits, and so forth, which will keep a small army of clerks busy for 20 years.

The recording, correcting, marking of changes of residence, keeping a record of the different amounts of loans, the different interest of each loan, the payment and nonpayment of loans, and continuing this record for 20 years, with records of deaths in the interim, will require an immense bureau and prove of tremendous expense.

Instead of the Government paying in cash, by one transaction, direct to the soldier, the banks of the country will, through patriotic motives, be compelled to advance this money. It will take from circulation and "freeze" at least $300,000,000 of the banks' assets for a period of three years, withdrawing just this amount of available money and credit from the use of the farmer, the merchant, the manufacturer, and the business man generally, creating a higher rate of interest and adding to the difficulties of a national financial situation which has now begun to adjust itself.

This method of payment will be the one, in my opinion, which will be asked for by 85 per cent of our soldiers, will be troublesome and harassing to the soldier, embarrassing and annoying to the bank, increase the general interest rate of borrowers throughout the United States, and place on the Federal Government an extensive and enlarged bookkeeping and accounting system. It will be objectionable to the soldier, injurious to the banks, and expensive for the Government.

But a very small per cent of veterans will accept vocational training, and how any man can be expected under the farm or home aid to be tempted by that proposition is beyond my comprehension.

The limited amount of money which he will draw will hardly permit him to pay for a team of Missouri mules. He could not buy a house, put a fence around his few acres of land, dig a well, or buy farm implements; nor would it permit him to have enough money to carry him through the period in which his crops were growing.

The last proposition of land settlement aid will have no attraction whatever for any ex-service man in my district.

Public lands have been "picked over" for 100 years, and what is left in the Western States is either mountainous, arid, or unfit for cultivation, and at best could be used only for grazing purposes. Grazing requires a large acreage and a large investment in cattle and equipment.

It would take nearly all of the average man's bonus to travel from the Eastern or Central States to the point of destination and take his family with him.

It would never be successful excepting by a large movement of population, which would involve the breaking of home ties and a leap in the dark for many a poor fellow who feels the call of land.

If we had suitable public lands at a low price for actual settlers, this last proposition might be practical for a very small per cent of ex-service men.

If either of the land options are considered in large numbers, it will mean the creation of a national board and expensive machinery to supervise, direct, and control improvements, and will necessarily result in clouded titles, lawsuits, and irritation, which will take not only all profits but all the joy out of life in attempting such a venture.

I am satisfied that none of the ex-service men in my district would consider anything but cash, possibly a few the vocational training.

If the ex-service man needs anything it is cash money to tide him over the necessities of the hour, to purchase such things as his fancy or his necessities dictate. He will want to use his own judgment as to expenditures and not have the dictation of the Government as to how his money shall be spent.

When he finds that he is not to receive cash but only security which can be used with a limited borrowing value, and that this security is nonnegotiable, the ex-service men will not be satisfied. He will be disgruntled, irritated, and angry.

The whole Government machinery necessary for such a loan is complicated, will occasion long delays, frequent trips to a bank, accompanied by witnesses—and possibly the banks will require affidavits—and all supervised by a costly system of inspection and Government red tape.

It is, of course, possible during the coming primaries and election to describe in glowing terms this supposedly generous conduct of the Government, but when the ex-service man actually attempts to make his collection and finds that he has been treated as a ward of the Government, intrusted with but 50 per cent of his money, and that under complicated conditions for its use, and the balance held for 20 years, he will not feel grateful.

If the Government intends to do this thing, why can it not be done gratefully, graciously, and honestly?

There is a possibility that some votes may be influenced in the year 1922, but it is quite certain that there will be a strong reaction and resentment in the year 1924, so that possibly the President may be right in two ways: First, politically; and second, in his consideration of the welfare of the soldier and the welfare of the taxpayer.

THE TAXPAYER.

Turning from the deceit practiced upon the soldier, let us give some consideration to the taxpayer.

The taxpayer I mean is the citizen who stayed at home and paid and gave with hearty good will—the men and women who fully did their "bit."

The taxpayer who in his way did his best even as the service man did his best.

This Congress has not pointed out the way to reach the war profiteer, and he will not have my sympathy nor the sympathy of the average taxpayer if he is reached, because none will have a kind word or lift a protecting hand for the man who made money out of misfortune while they gave "until it hurt" and the soldier risked his life.

The taxpayers to whom I refer are the men and women who subscribed to the Red Cross, the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, the Y. M. C. A.—to everything that could be suggested; who bought Liberty bonds until their savings accounts were exhausted and saw them go down 15 points, and in many cases were forced to sell at a loss; citizens whose businesses were disorganized, whose savings accounts disappeared, whose professions were neglected.

Citizens who could not borrow upon their real estate; who could not borrow money from the banks except at ruinous interest; whose business was restricted and controlled by the Government, while raw materials went to Europe, sending up the prices at home.

Some of the best assistants of these taxpayers were drafted, disorganizing the force upon the farm, in the factory, in the office, and in every vocation in life.

The men and women at home did their part and made their sacrifices. Their efforts may be soon forgotten while our boys who wore the uniform have received the praise, the glory, and the public applause.

Let us be fair with this great army of men and women who stayed at home and did their "bit"; who put clothes on the backs, food in the stomachs, and guns in the hands of the men who served; to the women who knit socks, rolled bandages, planted war gardens, and made war bread.

We must not forget the men who served upon the draft and returning boards, laid aside their businesses and professions at great financial sacrifice.

We must not forget the Four-Minute speakers who warmed the blood and kept the fighting and sacrificing spirit alive.

We must not forget the actors, actresses, singers, and entertainers who laid aside engagements paying large sums of money to give the best they had to stir the public and cheer our men.

We must not forget that small army of teachers of conservation, thrift, and domestic economy, who made the household save so that food and clothing could go faster to the fighters.

We can not forget the prayers in the churches, the sleepless nights, the sad hearts, the long lines watching the bulletin boards, the agony of suspense, the vacant chair at home, the reduced income, the added expense.

While there was glory in the Army, there was a quiet glory at home that came with sacrifice not so conspicuous, but almost as great as those who went to the front.

Military morale is dependent largely upon civil morale, and the civil morale of our Nation was perfect.

We must remember that when the German civil morale broke German military morale gave way, and the men and women who stayed at home and preserved our civil morale should be considered in the afterwar settlement.

Some of these things will fill fine pages of our history and, dividing somewhat the credit of our soldiers and sailors, they secured the respect of the world; and this respect for the United States at home in civil conduct, added to the renown won by our soldiers abroad, will be the best guaranty against future wars.

These taxpayers at home gave our boys better food and clothes than any other nation.

While England paid her soldiers $11.40 a month; France, $1.50; Japan, $1.78; Italy, $1.58; we paid our boys for overseas $33, and for home service $30.

While England allowed for total permanent disability $376.48, Canada $540, France $314, Italy $55.44, we gave $1,200.

In addition to the $60 given each soldier and sailor upon his discharge, amounting to $256,239,900, we assumed an insurance liability—exclusive of premiums paid by soldiers—of $860,154,495.65.

We had a casualty list of 205,000 men; England, 1,400,000; and France, 1,800,000. Actually on the front we had 2,805,000 men; England, 9,000,000; France, 9,500,000.

And yet the taxpayer at home paid for soldier benefits more money than the combined expenditures of both France and England, despite the fact that the combined casualties of these countries was fifteen times greater than our own.

The taxpayers are paying in cash every day $1,000,000 for ex-service men and their dependents.

The hospitalization bill is $78,000,000 a year; vocational training, $180,000,000. We have allowed 388,069 compensation claims, amounting to $310,969,181, and have not completed the work.

We have allowed 148,000 insurance claims, amounting to $1,321,673,335, of which $297,627,510 has been disbursed.

The "stay-at-homes" created for the purposes of the war a national bonded indebtedness of $23,000,000,000, of which we must pay $6,000,000,000 within 15 months. The annual interest on these bonds is $1,000,000,000, and it is estimated that now each family carries an additional war burden of $1,000.

The taxpayer does not complain of these expenditures, nor will the voice of a single decent man or woman be raised against an extension or increased cost for sick, disabled, or dependents.

But these taxpayers are entitled to know how much money adjusted compensation will cost, who will pay it, and when it will be paid.

They should know, so they may adjust themselves to the duty of meeting the expenditure when it comes. In other words, they must be thought of at the same time we are thinking of the ex-service man.

We have been discussing the national effort to do the right thing by the right-thinking taxpayer through the National Government.

STATE TAXPAYER.

Some mention must be made and credit given to the taxpayer's contribution through the State.

The general tax rate in nearly every State in the Union has increased, and, in addition, 24 States have voted bonuses amounting to $360,539,200 to be given to our service men.

In addition to these direct bonuses, many States have given exemptions and benefits of various kinds. Some give civil preference to veterans, certain exemptions from taxation, special aid to education, assistance in buying homes, and legislative assistance in procuring employment.

All of this was supplemented by thousands of volunteers who supported private organizations designed to help.

This is a fine record of the State taxpayer which will even yet be improved upon.

We must remember that the taxpayers in these 24 States will, in addition to the $360,539,200 voted by them, pay their full share of the national expense equally with the 24 States which have not contributed directly to the ex-service man.

The soldier paid the highest price for the war in risk and sacrifice, but we must not forget or belittle the sacrifices and the price paid by the taxpayer who did his work at home.

There were shirkers and "slackers" in the Army and there were shirkers and "slackers" at home. These are known in their respective communities, and will each receive the severest punishment possible; that is, the contempt of neighbors and associates.

I have been speaking of the 95 per cent of our men and women who did the fine, square thing both in the Army, the Navy, and at home.

THE GOVERNMENT.

There are three phases of war, all part of the whole—the preparation, the conflict, and the return to peace.

We went through the period of preparation with speed and efficiency. We carried to the conflict soldiers that amazed Europe with their courage, individuality, resourcefulness, and strength.

Instead of wasting time in exchange of diplomatic notes, if we had settled the war in the way of Grant and Lee, in the old-fashioned chivalrous way, the return to normal would have been accomplished, our Government would have known where it stood, trade and friendly relations with the enemy would have been restored, foreign exchange would have been adjusted, and business would now be proceeding with some degree of certainty.

When our soldiers were demobilized, instead of giving them $60—which would hardly get them back home with a new civilian outfit—we should have been more generous, as generosity at that time was needed most, and the failure to be liberal then is the basis for an adjusted compensation for those men who have suffered through loss of business and loss of occupation by reason of their service.

To-day, having passed through the preparation and the conflict, our National Government is faced with tremendous difficulties.

This period of readjustment and return to the normal will require upon the part of our officials the same courage, the same determination, and the same clearness which was required to take us through the other periods of the war.

If this is lacking there will be delays, uncertainties, wasted money, and "normalcy" will be a long way off.

The Government does not know where the money is coming from to pay its present bills. It does not know what real value can be attached to its $10,000,000,000 loaned to our allies—whether it will be paid even in part, or when, or even if the interest will be paid.

It has not cleared away the useless ships and war materials.

It can only guess the amount of its annual income.

The year's return from income taxes are not complete. What they will bring no man knows; but it can be reasonably surmised that they will be far less than they were for the year 1921.

We have only a temporary tariff tax; even the question of valuation has not been settled.

Internal-revenue taxes have been practically wiped out, and the cost of prohibition enforcement is running into startling figures.

In the meantime, in order to curtail and make Government expense balance with Government income, appropriations for rivers and harbors have been reduced.

The Army is being reduced and thousands of men will be out of employment.

The Navy is being reduced and thousands more will have no work.

Thousands of shipbuilding employees were discharged overnight without notice.

The appropriation for national highways has been cut. National irrigation and drainage programs have been suspended. Eighteen billions in railroad properties are facing readjustment or bankruptcy.

Not one of the great domestic problems has been settled.

The farmer is dissatisfied and uncertain of his future.

Four million men are idle, factories are closed, strikes threatened, a coal shortage predicted, banks crowded with "frozen" paper, and no man is certain of his industrial future.

We have a national war debt of $23,000,000,000 and each family is $1,000 poorer.

Sixteen billions of nontaxable bonds have been withdrawn as a source of Government revenue.

The people of the United States selected Mr. Harding for President and to him was given the control of the executive branches of the Government. He called to his assistance Mr. Mellon, an experienced financier and banker. He called to his assistance as Comptroller of the Currency a man of high repute and experience, Mr. Crissinger.

These three men, upon whose shoulders will ultimately rest the failure or success of our financial policy, have unanimously recommended that Congress shall provide the revenue for $1,200,000,000 to be paid by January 1, 1926, and a total of approximately $3,500,000,000 to be met in 1942, knowing that about the same time we will have to take up and cancel $11,600,000,000 in Liberty bonds.

If banks must refuse their regular customers or refuse the soldier, it is an embarrassment which should not be placed upon them.

If business can not borrow it will break and all classes will suffer.

The comptroller tells us that banks are carrying paper now long overdue in order to preserve financial stability in the country.

There are signs of returning prosperity.

Are we justified in endangering or destroying this pleasing prospect, especially if we do so over the protest and against the advice of the President of the United States, the Treasurer of the United States, and the Comptroller of the United States, who have charge of our financial system?

CONCLUSION.

We can not separate our 4,500,000 soldiers from the rest of our 100,000,000 citizens. An injury to one is an injury to all.

This bill will not satisfy the soldier. It will not fool the taxpayer. It will not improve a critical national situation.

The passage of this particular bill means delay for the soldier, uncertainty for the taxpayer, and confusion in national administration. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I am sure many Members of the House would like to hear the gentleman from California, he being certainly the best and closest student of military affairs in this body, and I therefore raise the point of a quorum being present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eleven gentlemen are present, a quorum.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, history always repeats itself. Let me read you an extract from Hazlitt's "Life of Napoleon."

The first consul had hoped for the duration of peace. He had, indeed, been so little apprehensive of a recurrence to a state of hostility that he had granted an unlimited leave of absence to every French soldier. * * * and the infantry regiments were nearly reduced to skeletons. The Cavalry in like manner had been suffered to dwindle away to almost nothing. The parks of artillery and field equipages were broken up. Every other consideration had given way to economy.

That is an extract from Hazlitt's "Life of Napoleon," and this occurred when Napoleon came back from Egypt and proclaimed himself first consul. It was December, 1799. In three years came that terrific war with England, and the French armies became larger than ever. The French commanders realized what a mistake had been made by discharging the men of the army and letting them return to their homes whether they were required or not. They realized what a mistake had been made in the name of "economy." I merely cite that instance as showing what was done over 100 years ago and what this committee of this House is trying to do practically 125 years later.

The prime mission of the Regular Army as fixed by the amendment of the national defense act, approved June 4, 1920, and as recognized by Congress in its appropriation act for the Army, approved June 30, 1921, may be summarized as follows:

To provide for the Regular Army.

To provide for the National Guard.

To provide for the Organized Reserves.

To provide for the reserve officers' training camps.

To provide for citizens' training camps.

To provide for our garrisons in peace and war for our overseas possessions.

Lately it has seemed to become profitable on the part of a good many of the men in Congress to insist on cutting down the allowances for our Army and Navy. Economy is the watchword of a good many legislators. But let me call the attention of the House to the fact that false economy is the poorest kind of economy.

Prior to our entrance into the World War our national debt was only about $1,000,000,000. By reason of our lack of preparedness we were compelled to expend during the 19 months we were in the World War the startling sum of $24,000,000,000. The generations to come after us will groan under the burden of paying the taxes to meet the cost of that World War.

But what had the country done in the years immediately prior to the World War to try to build up our Army? The national defense act was signed by President Wilson on June 4, 1916. It passed the House by a vote of 403 to 2.

Almost every Republican in the House stood with the Democratic President to build up a proper force for these United States, and I commend the actions of the Republicans in that Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman give the date again?

Mr. KAHN. That was 1916.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What month?

Mr. KAHN. It was March 23, 1916. The page in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is 4731.

Republicans and Democrats joined in passing the measure through the House. It was believed that this measure was a great step in advance of anything that the United States Congress had ever written upon the statute books regarding a military force. Under this act there was provided a force for the line of the Army of 175,000 men. In addition to that, the Staff Corps attached to the Quartermaster, Medical, and Signal Corps aggregated 43,000 men. There were also unassigned recruits and Philippine Scouts totaling 21,000 men. In other words, that act of June 3, 1916, aggregated a total of 239,000 men.

And then we were at peace with the world. We had not joined the World War, we had no war with anybody, and yet we decided to provide for a peace army.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to ask the gentleman if that figure included officers as well as men?

Mr. KAHN. No; they were enlisted men. In those years the membership of this House was trying to help the President of the United States to bring forth an army that would meet any possible emergency. The splendid manner in which both sides stood together on that matter ought to be a lesson to the Committee on Appropriations of this House at this time. [Applause.]

But the measure also provided that there should be an increase, in five annual increments, to the enlisted force. The first annual increment which was added to our Army consisted of 26,000 enlisted men. In April, 1917, the President exercised his authority under the law and authorized the enlistment of the four remaining increments. As volunteering was not rapid, the increase was slow. So that we entered the World War with about 155,000 enlisted men in our Regular Army and with an additional 84,000 authorized by the law but not yet recruited. Within a few weeks of the declaration of war the Army was recruited to full strength of 239,000.

Now, it is the purpose of the members of the Appropriations Committee to reduce the force to 115,000 enlisted men and 11,000 officers. This is a much lower number than we have had since the end of April, 1917. In my opinion it is altogether too drastic a cut at this time.

It might be interesting to call to the attention of the House what other countries of the world who participated in the Conference on the Limitation of Armament held in Washington expended on their armies per capita during the years 1920–21.

The British Empire, exclusive of its dependencies, with 45,516,000 population, expended $562,123,000, or $12.35 per capita.

The Republic of France, with 41,476,000 population, expended in the same year $933,927,000, or $22.52 per capita.

Italy, with a population of 36,740,000, expended $246,081,200, or $6.70 per capita.

Japan, with 55,961,000 population, expended $189,082,900, or $3.38 per capita.

While the United States, with a total population of 106,418,000, expended $343,155,303, or $3.22 per capita.

These figures show that we are exceedingly mindful of the welfare of our people in keeping down military costs and expenditures.

So much below all the other nations is the United States that it is ridiculous to attempt to cut down the force of this country at this time, when there is still a great deal of world unrest in the different parts of the universe. It might be attempted in a few years from now, when we get back to normalcy, but we are not back to normalcy yet. Our country has made every effort to bring about conditions of absolute peace everywhere, but take the case of China. The bill which is before us contemplates withdrawing 600 troops from China. I have here a letter from the Secretary of State on that very proposition. In China there is a serious civil war progressing. The south and the north have armies in the field against each other. The southern army is gradually moving toward Peking. We do not know but that another condition may arise in China that may require the presence of our troops in large numbers to protect the rights of our representatives. This is what Secretary Hughes said. It is addressed to me and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
March 15, 1922.

The Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
Chairman Military Affairs Committee,
House of Representatives.

SIR: With reference to your conversation of to-day over the telephone with the Far Eastern Division of this department, I have the honor to state that the right to station troops at Tientsin, China, and along the line of the railway which connects Peking with the sea was conceded to the United States and to certain of the European powers by the final protocol for the settlement of the disturbances in China of 1900, which was signed September 7, 1901.

During the Chinese revolution of 1911 and 1912 the powers who were party to the protocol of 1901, including the United States, considered that the disturbed conditions then prevailing in the neighborhood of Peking necessitated the stationing of troops at Tientsin and at other places along the railway between Tientsin and Peking, for the purpose of maintaining open communication between the capital of China and the sea. In recognition of its obligation in this connection the United States dispatched to Tientsin a number of troops, which in 1921 numbered 62 officers and 1,469 enlisted men. During the summer of 1921 the Secretary of War raised the question as to whether this number of troops might be entirely withdrawn or reduced, and on July 9, 1921, the State Department informed the Secretary of War that it did not favor the entire withdrawal of these men, because an action might result in unsettling the situation then prevailing.

The department expressed itself, however, as being agreeable to a reduction of 50 per cent. The Department of State now understands that a reduction of 50 per cent was effected last fall. The conditions prevailing on July 9, 1921, have not changed, and the department still believes that it would be inexpedient at the present time to effect any radical change in the present arrangement.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant, CHARLES E. HUGHES.

That is the sentiment of the Secretary of State regarding the withdrawal of troops from China.

Mr. Chairman, based on the national wealth of all the countries, including their dependencies, this showing which I am about to make is even more favorable than it was on the former statement I made a few minutes ago.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield now. I have just half an hour, and I want to finish this.

The United States has a national wealth of $350,000,000,000. The amount for our Army was $343,155,303, or ten one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the national wealth of this country.

The British Empire, with a national wealth of $180,000,000,000, expended for her army $800,524,500, or forty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the national wealth.

In France, the national wealth, including dependencies, is $100,000,000,000. The amount expended for the army was $933,927,000, or ninety-three one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the national wealth.

In Italy, the national wealth is $30,000,000,000. The amount expended on the army was $246,081,200, or eighty-two one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the national wealth.

In Japan, the national wealth is $25,000,000,000. The amount expended for the army was $189,082,900, or seventy-six one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the national wealth.

When compared with the sums of expenditures made by our people for pleasure or for nonessential commodities, the expenditures by the United States for military purposes sink into comparative insignificance.

For the fiscal year 1921 the people of the United States spent for admissions to theaters, concerts, cabarets, baseball games, and other entertainments of a similar character, $897,000,000—more than twice the appropriation for military purposes. In fact, the appropriations for the Regular Army, the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, and all expenses charged to the Army, including river and harbor work, cemeteries, and other nonmilitary accounts, only aggregated $418,000,000.

For tobacco and materials related thereto, such as pipes, there was spent the enormous sum of $1,151,000,000, or three times the amount expended for the Army.

For candy and chewing gum, $750,000,000, as compared to $418,000,000 for all Army appropriations.

For sodas and confections, $834,000,000, as against the $418,000,000.

For personal adornment, including perfumery, cosmetics, and jewelry, $959,000,000, whilst for all expenses charged to military affairs the amount was, as I have already stated, $418,000,000.

I merely cite these instances to bring to your attention the comparatively small amount used to furnish military protection to the citizens of our Republic.

Let me call the attention of the House to the small proportion of our population in our military forces as compared with the other principal countries of the world. Contrasted with the other leading world powers, our proportion of Army to population appears most favorable, as may be seen from these statistics of the Conference for the Limitation of Armament.

The population of the United States for the year 1921 was 106,418,000. The number in the Army was 151,000 men. The number per 1,000 population was 1.42.

The population of the United Kingdom was 45,516,000. The number in the Army was 334,000, or 7.34 per 1,000 of population.

The population of France was 41,476,000. The number in the Army was 600,000, or 14.47 per 1,000 population.

The population of Italy was 36,740,000. The number in the Army was 300,000, or 8.17 per 1,000 population.

The total population of Japan was 55,961,000. The number in the Japanese Army was 302,000, or a per capita of 5.40 for 1,000 population.

China had a population of 340,000,000 people. She had the number of 1,370,000 soldiers, or a percentage of 4.03 per 1,000 population.

A comparison of our national wealth with the number of soldiers now maintained in the Regular Army shows that each soldier is charged with affording protection and national security to $1,755,597 of the $350,000,000,000 total of our national wealth.

Each of these soldiers is at the present time protecting some 25 square miles of territory of our mainland and dependencies, and with giving 848 of our people a guaranty against foreign interference with their constitutional rights in their pursuit of health, happiness, and lawful gain. All this at a cost of $3 per capita of population. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations in reporting this bill. Possibly we do not all of us appreciate the tremendous character of the problems they had before them, the amount of research and examination and study and investigation that was necessary to enable them to reach a conclusion relative to the size and the cost of the Military Establishment at this time. There are some who think that the committee has gone a litle too far in reducing the size of the Military Establishment and in appropriating for its upkeep. I do not think we can properly or logically judge as to what should be the size of the Military Establishment or as to how much it should cost by comparison with other establishments with which there is not the slightest probability we shall come in conflict. I do not think that the question of the cost or size per capita or per unit of wealth can be properly or logically used in determining the size and the cost of a military establishment. Military establishments should be maintained by people who have no thought other than that of proper defense and no temptation to conquest, not from the standpoint of other establishments which may or may not be necessary elsewhere or of their comparative cost, but from the standpoint of the needs and necessities of the country from the viewpoint of the national honor and the national defense. There is always, necessarily, a wide difference of opinion as to the proper size of the establishment, even among those who view the size of the establishment from the standpoint of the factors, the purposes, I have just suggested.

The question before this committee was this: May we reduce the size of our Military Establishment as at present constituted and still perform our clearly necessary and essential duties so far as they are fulfilled through military forces and maintain the nucleus of an establishment that may with reasonable rapidity be expanded to meet the needs of an emergency? The committee believes that the reduction which is made will not bring the establishment below a point from which it may be expanded in time of emergency or below a point in numbers with which we may properly garrison the outlying posts of the Nation and maintain within the United States the proper nucleus for expansion in time of need. There may be those who believe that the enlisted strength should be 125,000 instead of 115,000. And there is ground for difference of opinion. But I think there are very few who have studied the situation but will agree that we can maintain such a military establishment as is necessary and essential to our present or prospective needs and still reduce both the enlisted and the commissioned personnel considerably below the present establishment.

I am convinced that the committee has not gone too far in reducing the establishment to an enlisted strength of 115,000, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts and a commissioned personnel of 11,000. Compared with the enlisted strength the commissioned personnel is liberal and should be.

The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who just took his seat, drew a parallel between the conditions in France after the time of the return of Napoleon from Egypt and our condition. It would have been a very happy thing for France and for the world if on Napoleon's return from Egypt he had not been seized with that lust for conquest that kept Europe in turmoil and in continual war for nearly 20 years, and left practically every nation on the Continent, France included, frightfully impoverished. There was no call for a war with England, and no one except Napoleon saw any necessity for the great forces that he gathered together for that fruitless attempt to invade the British Isles.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman give me five minutes more?

Mr. ANTHONY. I regret there is no more time available.

Mr. MONDELL. Two minutes more?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is only one loose minute on this side.

Mr. MONDELL. So that whether or no the forces of France had been reduced at that time below what they should have been, there was no necessity for the expansion that followed, and no reason for regret that that expansion failed to accomplish its master's purpose, save the regret of the man who sought to become the world's conqueror. America has no such thought. Her wish and desire is to maintain a military establishment first class in every regard and sufficient unto her needs. Such an establishment the committee believes it has provided. I am disposed to agree with them. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from New York, Dr. KINDRED.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of the crisis in the hospital needs of the disabled veterans of the World War, on which I shall speak now, and also on the subject of the adjusted compensation bill, or the bonus bill, on which I shall speak later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in view of the crisis in the hospital needs of the sick ex-service men of this country, and in view of the many letters which I, among other Members of the House, have received, calling attention to this sad and disgraceful condition, and in view of the further fact that the so-called Langley bill was introduced into this House on Monday last, I believe, carrying appropriations for $17,000,000 for additional hospital facilities for the ex-service men who are disabled and sick, I, as a physician of over 30 years' practical experience in hospital management, desire to call the attention of the gentlemen of the committee to certain very sad and disgraceful facts connected with the crisis in our hospital needs for the disabled war veterans to which I have referred.

As a specialist with a practical experience in mental and nervous diseases, which has extended over 30 years in the study of these diseases in the hospitals of New York, Pennsylvania, and Europe, I have naturally the keenest interest, along with all the other Members of Congress, in the hospitalization and medical cure of disabled ex-service men, and from this point of view and without bias or partisanship I intend to present to the Members of the House of Representatives some facts which they and the people of this country should know with relation to what has really been done and what has not been done for these disabled men, whose welfare we all wish to serve.

It is timely to present this whole subject now, in view of the fact that Congress will be called upon in a few days to vote upon the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], chairman of the Committee on Buildings and Grounds, and which will carry an appropriation of $17,000,000 for new hospitals, in addition to the $28,600,000 already appropriated for hospitals and hospital equipment for these disabled men.

Commencing with the need for hospitalization and medical treatment of the first group of ex-service men who were sent back home disabled, we find that the United States Government had very inadequate hospitals, both as to the number of beds and hospital construction and equipment, and that the demand for more hospitals grew very rapidly, and that this demand has not been met at the present time. In other words, the United States was totally unprepared at that time and is still unprepared to properly hospitalize and humanely care for the disabled ex-service men and women.

Congress discussed at some length the first appropriation to increase and provide additional hospital facilities, and early declared its policy, to which it still adheres, to provide at all times any amount of money really necessary for the proper hospitalization and humane treatment of ex-service men, and the Sixty-fifth Congress appropriated $10,000,000 and the Sixty-sixth Congress appropriated $18,600,000, totaling $28,000,000 for hospitals and hospital equipment, exclusive of the $17,000,000 to be appropriated by the Langley bill.

Congress has also passed a number of bills in the interest of the disabled veterans of the World War, including the Sweet bill, which consolidated all activities of the Government relating to ex-service men into the United States Veterans' Bureau, of which Col. C. R. Forbes is the director. This bureau has the large and grave responsibility of adjusting what will ultimately reach many millions of claims for insurance, allotments, and compensation, besides the work of providing vocational training and arranging for the immediate care of over 30,000 sick men and women who require to be hospitalized and provided with medical and surgical treatment and proper nursing and care.

Reference is here made to an official chart issued by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau in connection with claims for compensation for disability and allotments, and so forth, indicating the expenditure by this bureau of nearly $2,000,000,000. It is certain that many additional billions will be necessary for these purposes and for additional hospital facilities during the next 30 years. The problem of providing sufficient and proper hospital beds and medical treatment for these men and women is the one I mainly wish to discuss at present.

These more than 30,000 sick and disabled are classified into three main classes: The medical and surgical cases; the tubercular, and the neuropsychiatric cases.

There are approximately 9,300 medical and surgical cases, 11,698 tubercular cases, and 9,000 neuropsychiatric cases in hospitals and 3,000 outside of hospitals. The last-named group—the neuropsychiatric—include both the simplest and the most complex nervous cases, and also the so-called psychasthenic cases, meaning those with mild or serious nervous and mental symptoms, and also includes the various forms of outright insanity.

The proper housing and treatment of this last-named group, and also the tubercular group, is the disgraceful weakness of the Government's hospital system, to which I will refer later. This situation is a serious and sad one, and I approach the whole subject of its solution in no other spirit than that of trying to be helpful and constructive in the interest of our sick ex-service men, as well as in the interest of humanity and the people of this country.

The Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service and also the Surgeon General of the United States Army and the Surgeon General of the United States Navy, all preeminently able and experienced heads of their respective departments, have carefully studied the problem of hospitalization for the ex-service men, and particularly has the United States Public Health Service, which has had the full responsibility of the medical care and treatment of nearly all the war veterans since the close of the World War, made exhaustive studies of this whole subject, which studies, together with voluminous reports and data for additional hospitals, have been made public in the form of the reports of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service made annually to the Secretary of the United States Treasury.

The United States Public Health Service has from the beginning, with inadequate hospital and other facilities and under great difficulties, coped with the serious problem of supplying proper and humane medical and surgical treatment and care and nursing for the rapidly increasing number of sick and disabled war veterans; and it must in all fairness be stated that the Public Health Service deserves and should receive full credit and commendation for its achievements under difficult conditions, this service having, in fact, laid the broad and deep foundations for the good work in the medical treatment of the ex-service men which it is hoped and believed will be creditably continued.

The Public Health Service, under the direction of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, is still responsible for the medical care and treatment of the war veterans who are in hospitals owned and controlled by the United States Government.

The total number of men being hospitalized by the bureau February 23, 1922, according to a letter addressed to me by the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, was 30,879.

Approximately one-third of this total number—namely, 4,200 patients—suffering with nervous and mental diseases, the neuropsychiatric group, and over 6,000 tubercular and medical and surgical cases, are not in Government owned and controlled hospitals, but are "farmed out" in State and privately controlled hospitals and institutions at the rate of $3 per day paid by the Government for each patient.

I pause here a moment to repeat that approximately one-third of the total number have no facilities for humane and proper treatment. There are no hospitals owned and controlled by the United States Government for 6,000 and more tubercular and medical and surgical cases which can not be provided for in Government hospitals, making a total of 10,000 that have to be farmed out, about one-third of the total number of 30,000 patients, who are the wards of the Government at the present time.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. In the case of the 4,200 neuropsychiatric patients, would it not be better for individuals to take care of these men rather than place them in hospitals?

Mr. KINDRED. I am aware of the fact that that used to be considered a desirable method of treatment in certain kinds of cases. That is a long question which involves the question of neuropsychiatrics and a definition of each particular case. But with respect to some of the ideas involved in that connection the treatment of this whole class and various forms of curable psychiatric cases should be provided for as speedily as possible in Government-owned and Government-controlled hospitals.

In this connection I desire to say also that if a nervous case, which may be developing in the direction of outright insanity, or if a tubercular case whose tendency is to advance rapidly into an incurable stage—if these two classes of cases are not treated under proper conditions, if proper and nutritious food and proper surroundings and proper nursing and every hospital facility are not provided in the early stages of these two classes of disease, constituting, as we have seen, nearly one-third of the total number of cases under treatment by the Government, then there is no hope of cure at all in this class of cases.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman know of any tubercular cases in his district that are not receiving proper care?

Mr. KINDRED. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact—which is a matter of record and not denied—that there are over 6,000 tubercular and medical and surgical cases that are not in Government-owned and Government-controlled hospitals, but are farmed out, and I call the attention of the gentleman in that connection to a report which I have as to the manner in which certain cases are treated in the State of Ohio.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There are no such soldiers in my district who are not getting proper treatment.

Mr. KINDRED. The gentleman is indeed very fortunate if he has no tubercular ex-service men in his district. The gentleman himself must be exceedingly fortunate, and his district must be exceedingly well located from a climatological standpoint.

Further reference will be made to the neglect by governmental agencies which have deprived approximately 4,200 neuropsychiatric patients (meaning those who are suffering from the mildest nervous diseases and those with the most violent forms of insanity) and over 6,000 tubercular and medical and surgical cases, of proper and humane treatment in Government owned and controlled hospitals.

Notwithstanding the fact that the United States Public Health Service and other governmental agencies had worked efficiently in an effort to solve the problem of rapidly providing additional Government owned and controlled hospitals, and notwithstanding the fact that ample data had been provided over a year ago, as a basis for expediting the work of selecting additional hospital sites and completing additional hospital facilities, we find that after the lapse of more than one year since the $18,600,000 appropriation made by the Sixty-sixth Congress became available, and since the so-called medical consultants on hospitalization of the United States Treasury Department assumed the responsibility of locating and constructing the 6,000 additional hospital beds for which this appropriation was voted, that not a single hospital or a single hospital room had been completed February 13, 1922, according to a chart officially issued to me from the consultants on hospitalization, and which chart is entitled on the headlines thereof: "Progress Report of Consultants on Hospitalization," and which title is certainly a misnomer if the usual meaning is to be attached to the word "progress."

It is interesting to read from this chart, under the headlines "Remarks," the various explanations offered by the consultants on hospitalization for their absolute failure to provide a single additional hospital up to the date mentioned under this appropriation.

I desire in this connection in order to emphasize the unspeakably sad and disgraceful conditions which have resulted from this culpable delay and incompetency on the part of the consultants on hospitalization, as is evidenced by the bare facts in the case, to state that as a result of the failure of the consultants on hospitalization to grasp the great importance of their vast problem, and on account of their evident incompetence, that there is now a crisis in the hospitalization of ex-service men, as will be shown by the facts and figures, to be referred to later.

The fact is, according to the official report of the consultants on hospitalization of the Treasury Department, that not one single hospital bed is available under the $18,600,000 appropriation for which they were responsible for providing hospitals speedily.

I have here, and hold in my hand, an official chart issued by the consultants on hospitalization of the Treasury Department, which is, curiously enough, denominated "the progress chart." "The progress chart" will be interesting to analyze. The facts are that when "the progress chart" is analyzed it shows all sorts of flimsy excuses, all sorts of ridiculous explanations; explanations like this one, in the case of the metropolitan district of New York City, under the head of "Remarks"; on the progress of a hospital in that great metropolitan district there is a blank. The minds of the consultants on hospitals must have been much of the time a blank. Under the head of some other hospital projects, under the head of the hospital proposed at Marion, Ind., for example, occurs, "New bids were approved February 2, 1922." We find that they have made wonderful progress in the State of Ohio, in which State there has been a farming-out system which has been a disgrace to the community, and to which I shall refer later. We find that in that State they have made wonderful progress with the proposed hospital there, which is indicated here in the words, "Excavation completed."

I charge them with incompetency, with culpable neglect.

In various other projects, of which there are many, I find similar excuses and flimsy explanations. Therefore their report, which is designated a "progress chart," is evidently a misnomer.

It is interesting to consider some further facts which I desire to emphasize in this serious situation.

In addition to my own personal investigations in this matter and to bring out the facts showing a condition constituting a national disgrace, I here refer to letters addressed to me by Col. R. C. Forbes, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau; to the letter of John Thomas Taylor, vice chairman of the legislative committee of the American Legion; and to a personal letter and telegram from Col. Cornelius W. Wickersham, chairman of the hospital committee of the American Legion, Department of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut; and also to a public statement of Robert S. Marx, national commander of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, which last-named statement, dated January 11, 1922, I quote in part as follows—and to this statement I refer for further details as to the shocking conditions connected with the "farming out" system:

INADEQUATE TREATMENT IN OHIO.

We represent that in the State of Ohio to-day:

First. The Government of the United States has provided no hospital facilities of any kind to care for mentally disabled ex-service men.

Second. That the United States has farmed out the insane ex-service men of Ohio to State asylums which are notoriously overcroweded, undermanned, and inadequately equipped to treat and care for them.

Third. That, for example, in the Longview Asylum, of Hamilton County, Ohio, there are 42 gallant soldiers who broke down mentally under the stress of war, although Longview is so overcrowded that 240 of the inmates sleep on the floor like cattle every night.

Fourth. That although approximately one-half of the 250 mentally disabled soldiers now in Ohio asylums could be restored to reason by proper medical treatment and hospital care for their mental disease, these men are given no medical treatment of any kind for their mental diseases, and curable cases are being daily doomed to permanent insanity.

Fifth. That the tubercular and nontubercular patients in these institutions are not separated, but are all mixed together.

Sixth. Finally, we represent that the State of Ohio is making a profit averaging $300 a year for every ex-service man confined in Ohio asylums, which profit is made from the money paid by the United States Government to the State.

The truth of these charges is frankly admitted by the officials of the State institutions.

Dr. E. W. North, superintendent of Longview Asylum, in a public statement issued December 28, 1921, said: "These statements are not exaggerated in any particular."

Dr. H. S. MacAyeal, director of the State welfare department, said in a public statement issued December 30, 1921, that the State of Ohio made the profit shown by the following table on each insane soldier in its institutions, namely:

Institutions.	Cost per man.	Received from United States.	Profit made by State per man per year.
Athens State Hospital	$277.86	$547.50	$276.66
Cleveland State Hospital	238.24	547.50	309.26
Dayton State Hospital	309.54	547.50	237.96
Lima State Hospital	310.75	547.50	236.75
Masillon State Hospital	234.20	547.50	304.30
Longview State Hospital	231.28	547.50	316.22
Toledo State Hospital	286.85	547.50	260.64
Ohio Hospital for Epileptics	332.69	547.50	214.81
Institution for Feeble Minded	226.57	547.50	320.93

The State of Ohio makes a profit of more than $125,000 annually by reason of ex-service men in Ohio asylums.

What is true in Ohio is true in practically every State in the Union, because of the failure of the United States to provide adequate facilities for the medical care and hospitalization of our mentally disabled comrades.

The national magnitude of the problem may be grasped from the fact that almost one-third (27 per cent) of all sick soldiers now in hospitals are mental cases.

Moreover, for every mentally afflicted soldier in any institution today there is another soldier who should be receiving treatment, but whose family will not consent to have him adjudged a "pauper insane" and sent to one of these State asylums for the pauper or criminal insane, which are the only places now available. If the Government had proper hospitals, these men who now form the unseen army of neglected insane would soon come forth, and half of them could be restored to useful citizenship. We charge that not only are these cases totally neglected but that in thousands of cases the United States Government has farmed out its responsibility to care for its own fighters who broke down mentally because of their service.

I desire to emphasize particularly some of the foregoing statements of Commander Marx, notably that "approximately one-half of the disabled soldiers now in Ohio asylums could be restored to reason and health by proper medical treatment and hospital care for their mental disease."

It is a well-known medical fact that active and proper treatment must be given to insane and neuropsychiatric cases as well as to tubercular cases during the first two years of the duration of their disease if they are to be prevented from becoming totally incurable and deteriorating into hopeless cases.

In this same connection I quote from a telegram to me from Col. C. W. Wickersham, dated March 7, 1922, chairman hospitalization committee of the second hospital district—New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut—as follows:

Answering your telegram, situation in New York very bad. We have no tubercular hospital nor Government mental hospital here. Fox Hills Hospital is a miserable collection of war shack buildings wholly improper, particularly for tubercular and mental cases. Polyclinic hospital being abandonded. Catholic orphanage hospital not yet opened. Two thousand tubercular and mental cases in second district in contract hospitals, including 200 in State hospital for insane on Wards Island. Of 30,000 patients in the country at large 20,000 are mental and tubercular. Public Health Service has no mental hospital yet except St. Elizabeths in Washington, which is largely filled. Greatly lacking in tubercular beds. Am forwarding statement which will be of value.

C. W. WICKERSHAM.

I also quote the concluding portion of a statement made by Col. Wickersham March 4, 1922, as follows:

The sufferings of our disabled and sick comrades in the past and the great delays in giving them proper hospitalization, prompt and just disability compensation, and timely and adequate vocational training demand that we devote our efforts to the future, with the experience gained since the armistice, to lighten and relieve the hardships they have suffered, rather than to endeavor to minimize facts and cover failure. Let us face a bad situation squarely and use our best endeavors to provide a remedy.

C. W. WICKERSHAM,
Chairman Hospital Committee, American Legion,
Department of New York.

Some of the results of this crisis in hospitalization of ex-service men have been referred to frequently in the newspapers, but more specifically by responsible persons in position to know the full facts as to the wretched conditions among many of the sick ex-service men in State and privately owned hospitals, whose chief interest in these wards of the Government is a mercenary commercial interest.

I wish to be perfectly fair and to make acknowledgment to these State and privately owned hospitals, which have provided efficient and proper treatment to the ex-service men, whom they have cared for with great inconvenience and difficulty because of the overcrowding in most of these hospitals.

How may we get the best results in hospitalizing and humanely caring for our ex-service men? We have a duty, as Representatives in Congress, that extends beyond the necessary appropriation of millions of dollars for hospitals and such facilities. Ours is also the sacred duty of safeguarding the expenditure of these millions so as to secure actual results and prevent the money appropriated from being foolishly or improperly expended, as it is proposed to expend a part of the available $18,600,000 appropriation.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. Are any steps being taken to acquire new hospitals in New York for the treatment of tubercular patients?

Mr. KINDRED. There has been a very singular step taken in the State of New York to acquire a site for a hospital for the treatment of tubercular patients. As I am reliably and officially informed, the consultants on hospitalization of the Treasury Department are negotiating now for the acquiring as a site of a hospital for the care and treatment of tubercular patients the celebrated farm of Ex-Gov. Levi P. Morton, which was no doubt a fine show farm for blooded cattle, but which is located in the damp Hudson River Valley, where sore throats and colds and pneumonia and consequent tuberculosis are not uncommon, and which farm is practically at sea level. The price at which that farm is held is $400,000. It was a beautiful and delightful show place and it will probably make a charming residence for some of the higher-up consultants in this vast scheme of hospitals which it is proposed to adopt. [Applause.]

Tubercular patients, according to all medical authority, and, as is also well known to the lay mind, require an altitude of not less than 2,000 feet above sea level, and this required altitude may be gotten within 20 miles of the Ex-Gov. Morton farm in the beautiful Catskill Mountains, or within 75 miles in the dry, elevated climate of the Adirondack Mountains. Why locate a hospital for tuberculosis patients in a damp river valley, practically at sea level?

Another plan in which the consultants on hospitalization are about to embark is the establishment of a hospital at Tuskegee, Ala., at which medical and surgical cases and neuropsychiatric cases—including mild nervous diseases and raving insane patients—all in one hospital plant, within a small area, with the excuse of giving near-by clinical material to the students of the Mahary Medical College for Negro students. This mistaken and incompetent policy on the part of the consultants on hospitalization is in line with the experience of the State of New York in having wasted a million of dollars because a large hospital was started in a location which had to be abandoned, on the order of the highest court, for the reason that it was found impossible to provide proper sewerage.

The consultants on hospitalization, inexperienced in hospital management and practical policy, would ignore every principle and all experience in medical science for the welfare and care of the sick World War veterans, in order to play practical politics and supply the Negro medical students with clinical material at the expense of the welfare of these veterans.

It has been suggested that such suggestions as these as to hospitalization and hospital management is the reason why the Amerigan Legion at a recent meeting recorded its opposition to Brig. Gen. Dr. Charles E. Sawyer, chairman of the Federal Hospitalization Advisory Committee, who is reported in officially planning the management and policy of the magnificent Federal hospital system which we have so liberally provided for, to have ignored the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, the Surgeon General of the United States Army, and the Surgeon General of the United States Navy, all of whom are members of the Hospitalization Advisory Committee, who, as stated before, are experienced and profoundly learned in medicine and all the details of hospital management and policy.

If Congress wants to properly settle this all-important question as to the control of the policy of hospital management of the great hospital system which we intend to establish, it should safeguard that question and also safeguard the enormous appropriations we have made and intend to make by providing that the policy of hospital management should be in control of the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, or of a board consisting of that official and of the Surgeon General of the United States Army, and the Surgeon General of the United States Navy, these distinguished medical officers of the United States Government having coped with this and similar problems before, during, and since the World War. In addition to these, Congress might well provide that if, in the discretion of the President of the United States, additional competent medical specialists, experienced in hospital management, were required, the President should appoint them from among the most distinguished physicians in this country.

In this connection, it is interesting to read from the article referred to in the American Legion Weekly on "The hospital program crisis," as follows:

The American Legion has insisted at these hearings that the mistakes and delays experienced in the $18,600,000 program shall be avoided in the new program. Chairman Sprague, of the Legion's rehabilitation committee, has indorsed the proposal contained in the Langley bill, that Director Forbes, of the Veterans' Bureau, shall have sole charge of the whole new program. He has opposed the suggestion that the Federal Board of Hospitalization, headed by the President's personal representative, Brig. Gen. Charles E. Sawyer, shall have jurisdiction in the new program.

Mr. Sprague has contended that the history of the $18,600,000 appropriation is eloquent testimony that divided authority is the father of the two bureaucratic twins—delay and red tape—and that only by giving Director Forbes full authority to select sites and design and build hospitals in the quickest time possible, can the mistakes of the past be avoided. Director Forbes, speaking for himself, has told the congressional committee that he believes that, inasmuch as the responsibility for making use of the new buildings rests upon him, he should have absolute authority in determining where those hospitals shall be and what they shall be like. The congressional committee has shown that it agrees with the main proposals of the $17,000,000 appropriation bill. At this writing, however, it is still uncertain whether the White committee will be authorized to assist Director Forbes or whether the committee will grant the request of Brig. Gen. Sawyer and give his committee advisory jurisdiction.

Relative to chairman Sprague's testimony as to the bad results of the existing divided authority, it should be stated that the architects of the Treasury Department have also been insistently charged with inexcusable delay and red tape, especially in connection with their system of purchasing materials and hiring labor—the so-called hiring and purchase system—which system, it is reasonably claimed by John Thomas Taylor, vice chairman of the hospitalization committee of the American Legion, in a personal letter to me, has not brought about the completion of hospital construction as rapidly as it would have been brought about if this construction work were placed under contract to responsible bidders by the architects of the Treasury Department, with a severe penalty for failure to complete the work on time.

The representatives of the architects of the Treasury Department, after their alleged failure to efficiently expedite hospital construction, appeared before the Committee on Buildings and Grounds and argued that the $17,000,000 appropriation to be authorized under the Langley bill should be placed under the sole direction of the Treasury Department, instead of being appropriated to the Director of the Veterans' Bureau or to some other governmental agency than the Treasury Department.

All this, together with some other known and unknown facts, will explain that there has been recently quite a jealousy between certain governmental departments as to who should have the honor and privilege of expending the seventeen millions to be authorized by the Langley bill for additional hospitals.

It is not only of the utmost importance that these immense appropriations should be expended by the most efficient governmental departments, but it is also a matter of grave importance as to whether or not competent governmental medical officials are to control the management and policy of these hospitals after they are occupied by our disabled war veterans, and I wish to say with a knowledge of hospital management and policy that it would be, indeed, a calamity to the ex-service men and to our Nation if the management and general policy of these hospitals, after they are completed, are intrusted to incompetent and visionary physicians or other governmental officials who may have good intentions, but who are merely inexperienced dreamers in the practical workings of the administration and policy of a great hospital system.

Congress should prepare now to meet the hospital needs which will be acute during the next several years. During this period approximately 11,000 hospital beds owned by the Government and which are old and unfit will have to be abandoned, and this number of new modern hospital beds provided. Besides this number, an additional number of hospitals will have to be provided to care for the increase in neuropsychiatric and tubercular patients, which increase during the next four to six years, based on the ratio of increase during the past two years, will be approximately 10,000 to 11,000 cases.

Still an additional number of hospital beds will have to be provided to meet the present program for the additional 6,000 hospital beds recommended by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau.

To sum up, in addition to this number and to the total number of hospital beds now owned and rented by the Government—30,000—approximately 20,000 additional hospital beds will be needed in the next several years in order to meet the needs of the approximately 56,000 patients who will require hospitalization at the end of that period, including the rapid increase in neuropsychiatric and tubercular cases during the next several years.

In connection with the shortage of hospitals and the abandonment of Fox Hills and other unfit Government hospitals, it is pointed out, to the personal knowledge of myself and many others, that the enforced transfers of many patients from one hospital to another has resulted in many avoidable deaths, this being particularly true in tubercular cases, where such transfers in all kinds of weather and other unfavorable conditions cause an exacerbation of their diseases from exposure and fatigue.

This fact is emphasized by the intention to abandon Fox Hills Hospital, New York, and the consequent necessity to find hospital accommodations for 400 tubercular patients, many of whom are bedridden and whom it is intended, according to reports, to remove from the vicinity of their old homes and families to California and North Carolina, although it appears vacant hospital beds for that number can be found in the salubrious climate of Saranac and Liberty, N. Y., places peculiarly adapted to the treatment of tuberculosis.

From these facts as to the inadequacy of the number of hospital beds and proper facilities for neuropsychiatric and also tubercular cases, which inadequacy at this time, three years and three months after the armistice which ended the World War, is due to the neglect and incompetency of the governmental agencies already referred to, it will be seen that these wards are not only denied the humanitarian treatment to which they are entitled as deserving wards of the Nation, but that even from an economic standpoint the Government is failing to keep faith and do its duty toward its wards, our war veterans.

Let us as the people's Representatives in Congress continue our liberal policy toward the disabled ex-service men and provide them with the best possible hospital facilities and care, but after we have made liberal appropriations of millions of dollars let us see to it that additional modern hospitals are promptly completed and that the people's money for this noble purpose is not wasted in any foolish experiments. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by Rev. Marion D. Shutter, D. D., of Minneapolis, upon the subject of the Army of the United States as a constructive force. It is particularly timely and pertinent in view of the discussion upon the Army appropriation bill. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in 8-point type by printing the document indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Reserving the right to object, what does he claim the Army constructs?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I can not take up the time of the committee in a detailed explanation of what he says.

Mr. LONDON. Who is the gentleman?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Dr. Marion D. Shutter, pastor of the Church of the Redeemer at Minneapolis, who has lived there for 30 or 40 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman think a document of this kind should be printed in 8-point type?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I want it in a type in which it can be read. I have difficulty in reading the smaller type.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I never read the other; and I believe I inaugurated the custom of asking to have documents printed in 8-point type; but does the gentleman think we ought to adopt it as a practice in such cases as this? I think the gentleman ought to insert it in the ordinary small type in which documents are printed in the RECORD.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the gentleman is going to object, I will modify my request accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the document in the ordinary type in which extracts are printed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document is as follows:

THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES AS A CONSTRUCTIVE FORCE.

[By Rev. Marion D. Shutter, D. D., Church of the Redeemer, Minneapolis, Minn.]

In these days of discussion about armaments—naval, land, and air—days in which doubts have been raised about their value, days in which in some quarters there is a demand for scrapping them all without further debate, it is well to keep our heads. There never has been an epoch in which the salvation of the world's civilization was so swiftly followed by attempts to discredit and to degrade the means of that salvation. Armies are now thought of, even by the best informed, as simply and only agencies of destruction; the soldier is stigmatized as one whose sole trade is slaughter. Odium is constantly thrown upon his calling. The country is so insistent upon peace that investigating committees are formed to smirch the men who made it possible. "Statesmen" make war, soldiers make peace. To be logical, we ought to "scrap" the "statesmen" or politicians. There is a side—not often thought of—to this whole question upon which I wish to speak. In what I have to say I shall confine myself to the Army of the United States.

My thought upon this subject may be condensed into a sentence or two from Gen. Leonard Wood. Speaking of the Army, he says: "As a matter of fact, it has been one of the great influences in opening up and building up the country and in maintaining public order. Of recent years it has played a very great rôle as an administrative force, and in areas under its control great advances have been made, and lasting benefits to humanity secured."

This is my theme, and I ask you to consider with me some of the facts.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE WEST.

Let us go back to the close of the Civil War. In the years immediately following the Army was the main instrument in the maintenance of order and the safeguarding of life in the South, and the protection of lines of communication incident to the development of the West.

Three things stand out in this period—

First, the peace which the Union soldiers had just achieved was menaced, as well as the interests of the entire Western Hemisphere, by the attempts of France to set up an empire in Mexico with a Hapsburg upon the throne. An Army moved toward the border and served notice upon France that no foreign empire was to be established in Mexico. Gen. Grant sent word by Sheridan, "It shall not be," and it was not. No drop of blood was shed.

Next, the Army preserved order in the South during the days of reconstruction, while a new system was being wrought out upon the ruins of the old. This service was, of course, not recognized at the time by all parties concerned; but without it anarchy would have prevailed.

And third, it cleared the Wild West of the savages who hindered the construction of the great continental railway lines which opened up the West for settlement and protected the settlers. It is difficult to realize that at the close of the Civil War the region beyond the Mississippi, excluding portions of older States, a region containing about two-thirds of the area of the United States proper, had only a population of a million and a half. Vast territories were peopled only by nomadic savages, who gained their livelihood by hunting the buffalo. The transformation of this immense desert and wilderness into "a peaceful land of ranches and railroads, of wheat fields and fruit farms, of dams and irrigation ditches, of mines and macadam roads," forms one of the biggest facts in American history, and is due primarily to the troops who went before, under the leadership of such men as Gens. Custer and Miles and Crook, crying out, as did the prophet of old, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord!"

SANITARY WORK OF THE ARMY.

Wherever the Army has gone it has not only set up public order but it has promoted the public health. This service alone has been worth many times the cost of maintaining the Army in times of peace.

Immediately after the Spanish War the Army took over the administration of the acquired territory. This involved not only the everyday conduct of public business, but an immense amount of constructive work incident to the establishment of a school system, construction of great public works, and administration of the general laws governing charitable institutions, as well as an enormous amount of sanitary organization, an electoral law, and everything necessary to convert a war-wrecked, demoralized, and exhausted colony, fever stricken and overrun by disease, into a self-governing republic. The salvation of Cuba and Porto Rico was the army of occupation. The same was true of the Philippines. They were saved from anarchy and epidemics by American soldiers. Has our trade with these islands justified the expense? Can anyone doubt that the presence of an army along the Mexican border prevented our foes during the last war from organizing hostility against the Nation, from a possible effort to induce Mexico to try to recover her ancient territory?

The sanitary work alone revealed the secret of yellow fever in Cuba, of beriberi in the Philippines, of typhoid fever along the Mexican border, of malaria and smallpox in Porto Rico. The annual death rate in Porto Rico alone was soon reduced by a number exceeding the total number of men killed during the Spanish-American War, and an inquiry made some years ago of all planters in the island with reference to their workers indicated an average increase of 60 per cent in efficiency. The knowledge gained in Cuba and Porto Rico employed in Panama made the canal possible. Epidemics of malaria and yellow fever had mowed down the workmen under the French like machine guns. They were worse than battles. The engineers under Gen. Goethals built up a sanitary foundation.

In this connection it may be remarked that the new laws in many of our States concerning the treatment and control of venereal disease have grown out of experiences in the Army during the recent war. These laws are the result of suggestions from the medical and surgical officers of the Army. The Columbia Law Review (January, 1921) says:

"Provision was made in the selective conscription law for strict supervision of such diseases in the Army, and private and public health agencies earnestly planned cooperation. The cumulative effects of this activity may be seen in the increased legislation on this subject in practically every State of the Union."

THE ARMY IN NATIONAL CALAMITIES.

There are certain great calamities that from time to time come upon the Nation through flood or fire when the help of the Army is invoked. The Army did tremendous service for the country in handling the grave and alarming conditions arising out of the great Mississippi flood of a few years ago, and did it so quietly that the country hardly knew about it and so effectively that thousands and thousands of people were saved from watery graves or from starvation. The same was true at Dayton, Ohio, and later at Pueblo and San Antonio. The San Francisco earthquake, when Gen. Funston and his soldiers took charge, is another case in point. The Army on such occasions is not sent to destroy men's lives but to save them.

In this connection and while there is so much complaint about the burdens of taxation for war—past, present, future, possible, and impossible—it should be remarked that by no means all of the appropriations for Army and Navy are spent for war. The Bureau of Insular Affairs is a bureau of the War Department, and its expenses come from Army appropriations. Also, there is an item in the Navy budget, amounting to $343,000, for the government of the Virgin Islands. Army appropriations cover the care of flooded and devasted districts. Army engineers have charge of much of the river and harbor work, and other improvements, like the Panama Canal, which we have already said could never have been built without the Army. The Coast Guard Service is now a part of the Navy. Its hydrographic office makes all navigation safer. Much of our colonial administration comes out of naval appropriations, as well as the expense of such emergencies as those presented by Haiti and San Domingo. These last are much in evidence. In spite of protests by incompetent authorities in those islands, our commission has just reported that "peace and order have been established everywhere, sanitary work has cleaned up once filthy towns, and roads and other public works are under way," and believes that "the continued presence of the small American force in Haiti is as necessary to the peace and development of the country as are the services to the Haitian Government of the American officers appointed under the treaty of 1915." Appropriations for the Army and Navy are not all spent in the work of slaughter and destruction. They build much more than they batter down.

COST OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

One word more as to the cost of armaments. The burdens of taxation are heavy, and will be for a generation or more to come. But coming generations will benefit by the results. We fought the battles of to-morrow no less than of to-day. The burdens are heavy, but they need not be exaggerated. The statement was made in the recent educational convention here that "approximately 92 cents out of every dollar of the Nation's income goes for wars, either past, present, or future, and that the amount required to build the battleship Tennessee would support the high schools of the State of Tennessee for four years." The proportion of the dollar is variously stated at from 40 to 98 cents. In any case it is not correct. The burdens of the past must be taken care of in any event. Set them down to the charge of pacifism, incompetence, and graft. We have to pay them because we were unprepared. They run back to the days of the Civil War. But even so, would you be rid of them, and have the things that were accomplished done away? Would you bring back slavery? Would you restore the power of Spain in Cuba? Would you prefer, in the case of the World War, to pay out what you are paying to your own Government in tribute to a conqueror? That is precisely what would have happened if Germany had won. These obligations would have to be paid if we disarmed to-morrow. The future we do not know. The only real question is, What are armaments costing us to-day, and is the cost out of proportion to the other expenses of the Government? The actual appropriation for 1920 and 1921, for Army and Navy both, was $862,889,077; for 1921 and 1922, $748,686,868. Included in these appropriations, as we have seen, are items which do not properly belong there. For the fiscal year, therefore, about 18 cents out of every dollar expended by the Government went to the Army and Navy; this year it will be less.

Glaring contrasts are made between the amounts expended for national defense and the amounts expended for government, education, public health, and other departments. The fact is obscured that the comparisons are all made within the sphere of the Federal Government, and that it is only the Federal Government which can provide for the "common defense." But States and communities have to be governed. Add the cost. They have to educate. The Federal Government does not. Add that cost. They have to engage in various other enterprises. Add the cost. If the cost of State, county, city, and other local government is taken into account, the proportion of every dollar that goes for national defense is exceedingly small. Nor can it properly be called waste. Most of it is distributed at once in the community and goes into the ordinary channels of trade and industry, as does any other money paid out by the Government. According to internal revenue returns the American people in 1920 paid the following bills: For the Army, $418,000,000; for tobacco, $1,151,000,000; for chewing gum and candy, $750,000,000; for soda water and confections, $834,000,000; for amusements, such as baseball, cabarets, and movies, $897,000,000; and for silk stockings, perfumes, and other matters of milady's wardrobe, $959,000,000. Is it worth while for a gum-chewing generation to worry about the Army and Navy? We are much more in danger of being suffocated by the fumes of nicotine than by poison gas!

THE ARMY AND PROTECTION AT HOME.

Closely connected with what we have just been saying, is the protection of life and property during those periods of violence when strikes ripen into defiance of the Government of the United States.

One such instance was furnished in 1894, when the American Railway Union, under the leadership of Eugene V. Debs, who has just been restored to his bereaved country, undertook to prevent the running of mail trains and defied the injunctions of the United States courts. Grover Cleveland, then President of the United States, fearlessly did his constitutional duty, and the rule of the revolutionary mob was brought to an end. How much in property and in human life did the Army then save to the Nation?

Another instance is very recent. The defiance of law and authority by the striking miners of West Virginia needed the presence of Federal troops—who did not fire a shot. It is the province of the police to preserve order; it is the province of the soldier to put down insurrection. When strikes ripen into insurrection they must be put down as any other uprising against the authority of the Government, State or Federal.

The Government has just had to call upon the marines to protect mail trains. A letter from a soldier says: "Notice also the only step which has been taken to combat the incessant mail robberies. United States marines are guarding the mails to-day. A potential mail robber was shot by one of these men, and by way of expressing his gratitude the governor of Wisconsin wants the marine tried by court-martial."

FOREST PATROL AND OTHER PURSUITS OF PEACE.

The forest patrol is a part of the Air Service of the Army and under the War Department. It is now discontinued (or was for a time) for lack of appropriations by Congress in the interests of economy and to discourage "militarism."

The Department of Agriculture tells us that the entire forest area of the United States covers 463,000,000 acres and that this region is being burned over at the rate of 10,000,000 acres yearly, reforestation requiring a minimum of 20 years. Now, in 1920, the Air Service, through its forest patrol, saved from destruction by fire in two and one-half months standing timber valued in excess of $35,000,000, or considerably more than the entire appropriation that year for the air defense of the United States.

Camp Bragg is carrying out in a different way the national plans for forest reclamation. A report sent me from that camp says: "The Army has taken over the job. Soldiers, trained in forest preservation, constantly patrol the entire timbered area. Over a hundred men daily are logging out the fallen timber. A lookout station with radio apparatus has been established on a high point to report any outbreak of fire. A party of engineers is cutting a firebreak around the entire reservation. Fire protection is insured, not only to Federal property but to the surrounding country. Thus the Army is doing work that ordinarily falls to other departments of the Government. Besides it is training men to be forest rangers and spreading among the public the principles of forest conservation."

But the soldiers at Camp Bragg—and this camp is a typical one—are developing the roads of that region, and to facilitate transportation between the camp and Fayetteville they are at work upon a railroad between the two places. The Army is promoting many agricultural interests by the cultivation of fruits and grains, by the breeding of farm animals, and by the establishment of model dairies. All this work is carried on under the direction of experts. The benefits are derived mostly by the public at large. "The immediate community profits by the commerce attracted by a large military camp and by the employment of numerous civilians in various occupations on the reservations. Approximately $285,000 was paid out during the year of 1921 for civilian employees at Camp Bragg"—and it all came out of Army appropriations. So the military camp to-day has its full share of plowshares and pruning hooks as well as of swords and spears.

The service that the Army has done to the automotive industry is not generally realized, particularly in the matter of developing trucks and tractors. It was through experiments conducted at Fort Sill that a tractor was devised which could operate successfully when completely submerged. In one instance a stream was crossed where there was no bridge and where the driver sat in water up to his neck. In 1919 the Army staged the first transcontinental motor convoy. Civilian firms were invited to send samples of their trucks which were taken in the convoy, and the advantages of each noted, and the manufacturers had the chance of benefiting by this experience and correcting the defects which developed.

"Summing up," says the report from Camp Bragg, "the one thing brought into great prominence is that the Army spends a large portion of its appropriations in nonmilitary pursuits. The work done is useful and constructive. It offsets much of the great expense paid out for armament." And yet, to use the Scripture simile, you might bray some people in a mortar with a pestle, yet would not their notions of "militarism" depart from them.

THE ARMY AND EDUCATION.

There is another feature of the Army to-day that is extremely important. How much this feature may now be modified by the cutting down of appropriations and personnel I can not say. That is the educational work of the Army.

"The damfoolest thing that has come out of Washington," said a leather-faced major at a Texas post, "since Secretary Root sent out 780 school-teachers to the Philippines in one transport while they were still shooting at us!" "Well, that didn't work out so badly," drawled the colonel. "The Army caught 'em an' the teachers taught 'em!" "So it is to-day," comments the narrator, "the recruiters catch 'em, and the Army schools teach 'em!" Another says about the United States Army as reorganized since the World War, that "it is a debatable point as to whether the arts of peace are not advanced by increasing and retarded by decreasing it." Mr. Theodore M. Knappen, in the June (1921) Review of Reviews, concludes: "The Army is to-day an indispensable part of the educational and Americanization programs, and there be competent observers who say that it is educating better than the public schools and Americanizing better than the social settlements." Those are the words of Mr. Knappen.

I do not pause to discuss this statement; but to particularize a little more: (1) The vocational training (117 different trades) is pronounced the most effective system in the country, and with it goes a general training that fits one to enter West Point or the freshman class of any first-rate college or for the best citizenship when Army days are over. (2) But before all this come the recruit educational centers, to which are assigned "native recruits who are illiterate or, being literate, are unfamiliar with English." In June (1921) there were 4,500 men of 60 different nationalities in these basic schools, of whom 3,500 were illiterates. They go out equipped with a good working knowledge of English, reading and writing, and other basic elements of education; and only after one has taken this course is he assigned to a regular military unit and enters the general educational or vocational courses. (3) Finally comes instruction in science, civics, history, and literature. Similar courses of instruction are also given in the Navy. Thus the Army provides a primary element of defense in making loyal citizens, thus protecting the State from violence within. It combats vicious and revolutionary ideas and tendencies through its schools, which firmly ground the students in political elementals. It is estimated that more than half of these men come from that stratum in which the "Red" unrest breeds. Trained to think straight, they go back after Army days to strengthen the forces of law and order and existing Government. The statement went the rounds of the daily press not long ago that, in a single month, $2,000,000 had been paid out for vocational training alone. But it is all in those Army appropriations so bitterly assailed.

These are some of the constructive things the Army does in times of peace. The day may come when armies will be no longer needed, when their peace-time activities will be cared for by other agencies; but just now when nothing is too bad to say about the Army and nothing is too foolish for Congress to do about it, this word of justice should be spoken. We all know what it can do in time of war; we do not all know its great services in times of peace. No other organization has a more splendid civic record!

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be confined to the Porto Rican subject, and I desire to say in the beginning that I am going to deal as little as possible with personalities, because in my opinion the question concerning Porto Rico has assumed the issue as to whether or not that island is to be American or un-American.

Porto Rico is a beautiful and fertile island, 100 miles long and 36 miles wide, and possesses a wonderful landlocked harbor at San Juan. It stands at the entrance to the Caribbean Sea. It is the guardian of the Gulf of Mexico and the Panama Canal. It occupies the same strategical position toward our southern coast that Hawaii occupies in the Pacific. It was taken from Spain in 1898 as the result of the valor and the sacrifices of the Americans who served in the Spanish-American War and was paid for by their blood. Its harbor will be the port of call between America and the countries of South America and Africa in the great trade that we hope and believe will be built up between those splendid States and our own.

For four centuries, under the rule of kings, the inhabitants of the island made but slight progress. The common people had but little chance for advancement and the resources of the island were used to produce revenue for Spain.

From 1898, when our Government took control, until 1916, an American policy was adopted. Schools were established and the people given to understand that while they had the protection and a part in the greatest people's Government on earth, they would be assisted and not restricted in the improvement of their condition and the working out of their problems.

In 1916 Congress passed the Jones bill, giving to the people of Porto Rico the right to elect the members of their own legislature and senate, and to pass laws for the government of the island, levy taxes, dispose of the public moneys, and so forth, and establish a government with more liberal provisions than that enjoyed by Hawaii and Alaska, the intention being to permit the people of the island to largely manage their own affairs, but retaining the governorship for the protection of the common interests of America and the Porto Rican people, for it must be understood that the large majority of the people of Porto Rico did not then, and do not now, take that active personal interest in their government that the people of our States do.

I had the honor and the pleasure of visiting Porto Rico two years ago, and I come to you with information as the result of personal investigation. I found that the few still governed the many, the common people took but small interest in their public affairs, leaving to those of wealth and higher education the management of their government. The schools were well attended, although but few could speak English, which I was informed by the commissioner of education resulted from the influence of those controlling the government, who encouraged the teachers to disregard the rule which provided that English should be taught one hour a day.

The minority possess the wealth and higher education, but the masses are poor and without property. At a banquet given the congressional delegation one of the principal speakers stated that the people of the island and its resources had progressed more in the 20 years of American control than in 400 years under Spanish rule. But I was later astounded when the president of the senate, Antonio Barcelo, in his address openly advocated the separation of the island from the United States, and was the more amazed because the banquet was presided over by the then governor of the island. My inquiries brought me the knowledge that the Unionist Party of Porto Rico was carrying an independence plank in their platform and were openly advocating it and building up their party on that policy and denouncing all who opposed it. The gentleman who accompanied me in our trip over the island told me of the spirit of resentment by the members of this party toward Hon. JOSEPH CANNON because when he visited the island he had denounced the secessionists and frankly told them "their party was disloyal, would not succeed, and would only interfere with the benefits which the island and its people could have under the American flag."

Since that time the Unionist Party has continued its teachings of secession from the American Government and has carried the independence plank in its platform. After the last election, in which it was successful, there was a parade of the Unionist-Independence Party, with thousands of its followers in line, each carrying the one-star flag. Not an American flag! A number of Porto Rican soldiers of the Regular Army who took part were court-martialed and relieved of their duty for several months. The children have been taught in the schools to honor and love only the one-star flag. I have a picture of the interior of a Porto Rican schoolhouse, showing the one-star flag of Porto Rico displayed on the wall of the schoolroom.

On February 23, 1921, many months before President Harding appointed the present Governor of Porto Rico, the local legislature, controlled by the Unionist-Independence Party, was in session and had before it for discussion a resolution "petitioning the President of the United States, Warren G. Harding, not to make a new appointment to the office of the Governor of Porto Rico, as the majority party was well satisfied with the then incumbent in office," under whose governorship the Unionist-Independence Party had openly advocated the independence of the island. During the discussion of this resolution, which was opposed by both the Republican and Socialist minorities in both houses of the legislature, several speeches were made by members of the majority party in favor of the resolution, and at that time the speaker of the house of representatives, Coll y Cuchi, boldly stated:

No matter how strong a man the new governor should be, the majority party would break him as they had broken other governors before.

This was the sitting which awaited the appointment of a governor by President Harding. A crisis which would either result in the recall of the people of the island to the patriotic devotion to our people's Government, which had done so much for them, or would let them continue to be led away into a one-man government and a return to conditions that existed before the American flag was raised in Porto Rico.

I read from an editorial of the Times, published in San Juan, P. R., on November 12, 1921:

When Gov. Reily reached Porto Rico he found the office of governor had been submarined. The legislature had adjourned, but the chairman of the Unionist central committee occupied the senatorial quarters, and as party chief commanded the full force of the senate when the latter was in session. The amazing fact was presented of the entire working force of the senate continued on the pay roll after the senate had adjourned, and the chairman of the party had dictated the appointments to be made by the governor, going through the farce of sending to the chief executive three names, but telling him which one to select. Occasionally the governor had asserted himself to the extent of nominating some Unionist not named, but he soon learned that if he expected his nominations to be confirmed he must accept the suggestions made. When Gov. Reily announced his determination to expose and destroy the independence propaganda, the Unionist leaders and the Unionist press let loose the dogs of war.

The paragraphs in the inaugural address of Gov. Reily that brought down upon his head the first condemnation of the leaders of the Unionist-Independence Party read as follows:

INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF GOV. REILY, JULY 30, 1921.

I have made considerable investigation of your school system here, and while the work has been good and progressed in many ways, I shall not be satisfied until the whole system is greatly improved along the lines of American ideas and American ideals. As Porto Rico is as much a part of the United States as is Ohio or Kentucky, I hope to see the language of Washington, Lincoln, and Harding taught equally with that of Spanish in our public schools, and that all other languages shall be secondary. Therefore English must be taught more and more. This I shall insist upon, and the commissioner of education and all his subordinates shall be instructed accordingly. * * *

Our matchless President, a President of all the peoples over whom he rules, and our great Secretary of War, John W. Weeks, are as deeply interested in the Porto Rican people as they are in those of any State in the continental Union. They would be deeply distressed to see any feeling or growing sentiment on these islands tending toward any thought or idea of independence. It has come to me that the agitation of independence on these islands comes, in greater measure, from foreigners. If that be true, I want you to be fully aware that there is no room in Porto Rico for any foreigner who is not willing to support and uphold our established Government. Neither is there any sympathy or possible hope in the United States for independence for Porto Rico from any individual or from any political party. Let no man or newspaper deceive you. The last two great national conventions held in the United States, Democratic and Republican, declared unanimously against independence for Porto Rico. Neither, my friends, is there any place on these islands for any flag save the flag of our beloved and common country, the Stars and Stripes, and there never shall be. So long as Old Glory waves over the United States it will continue to wave over Porto Rico. Old Glory has come to stay. * * *

In closing, my friends, I desire to repeat that I shall always have an extended hand and a sympathetic heart for every toiler in Porto Rico, whether he speaks my language or some other, whether he toils on the plantation or toils in the sweatshop, or toils at the banking counter: all, all are welcome to come to me at any time that I may be able to lift any burden or assuage any sorrow.

Immediately the heads of the Unionist Party began their attack upon the governor, and failing to cause him to weaken, and finding that the people of Porto Rico were going to stand by him, they transferred their fight to Washington. When the governor returned to Washington in November last on matters connected with his administration a hostile reception was staged on his landing in New York, and the public press was filled with ridiculous stories about his actions as governor.

The Resident Commissioner for Porto Rico in Washington, Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA, aided by one W. McK. Jones, and acting under instructions from members of the Unionist-Independence Party in the Porto Rican Legislature, undertook to present to the administration in Washington charges against the official conduct of Gov. Reily which were so ridiculous and without consequence that they were later withdrawn. The fight was then transferred to Kansas City, the governor's late home, and after a good deal of muckraking a new set of charges, sustained as it appeared by affidavits attacking the life and character of E. Mont Reily, the citizen, before he had been appointed governor, were filed with the Secretary of War. In this campaign the Porto Rican enemies of the governor and W. McK. Jones were aided by a Washington attorney by the name of Keene, whom they had employed.

When Gov. Reily learned of these charges and affidavits he went to Kansas City and a few days later filed with the administration in Washington a set of counteraffidavits destroying all the charges that had been made against his character; perhaps the most serious of these was signed by D. W. Ross, a State bank inspector of the State of Missouri. After Reily reached Kansas City, Ross made a second affidavit, which I will read to you:

D. W. ROSS'S AFFIDAVIT NO. 2.

Donald W. Ross makes the following sworn statement:

"I have lived in Kansas City, Mo., for about 15 years, and during that time have been connected with several banks. I am now one of the State bank examiners under Gov. Hyde's administration. About a month ago a man by the name of Mack Jones, and Keene, a lawyer from Washington, came to see me at the Planters Hotel, St. Louis, Mo., where I was temporarily stopping and looking after some work for our department. They were brought and introduced to me by a representative of the Kansas City Star. These men questioned me very closely as to what I knew about Gov. Reily. They stated that they had information that Gov. Reily had asked me to pay him for his influence to be used to secure an appointment as a national bank examiner. I stated to these men that I had discussed an appointment with Gov. Reily on his return from Washington in the late spring of 1921.

"After some conversation with them they asked me if I would sign an affidavit, and I told them that anything that was true I would be willing to swear to. Later that evening, after spending several hours in their room, at which time considerable liquor was served, I signed an affidavit which was presented to me without reading it.

"I wish to further state that Gov. Reily at no time asked me for any money or any other consideration of any kind or character for his influence, nor did I ever make any offer or consideration to Gov. Reily.

"I desire to say furthermore that I have never heard of Gov. Reily ever asking anyone for any money to help secure any kind of an appointment or any office.

"I have known Gov. Reily for 15 years, and have known him as a man of the highest character and integrity, and have never heard anyone speak of him otherwise in his dealings.

"I desire to repudiate in every detail any affidavit I may have signed pertaining to Gov. Reily which was given to Mack Jones and Keene, as I have no knowledge of what said affidavit contained."

DONALD W. ROSS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 14th day of January, 1922.

[SEAL.] W. G. VORNDBROOCK,
Notary Public, City of St. Louis, Mo.

My commission expires February 9, 1922.

I understand that since that time this man Ross has made still another affidavit, the best evidence of the character of the man.

I have also some affidavits in my possession, signed by citizens of Kansas City, who were approached, and who refused affidavits to those who were trying to trump up charges against Gov. Reily, and in which they say they only have good words in behalf of the governor. I mention these to show the character of the attack by these men who are seeking to destroy the effect of the governor's stand for Americanism in Porto Rico.

I claim that these facts warrant my making the charge on the floor of this House that the attack on the Governor of Porto Rico which has been made by Resident Commissioner CORDOVA DAVILA was to carry out the policy of breaking the governor in order to permit the politicians who have been dominating the policies in Porto Rico to continue their effort to separate the people and the island of Porto Rico from the American Government, and I want to clarify the record a little as to the controversy between the Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico and the present governor.

It is admitted, conceded, and proven by both sides that the governor did try to get along with the acting commissioner, and that Resident Commissioner CORDOVA DAVILA started as though he were going to be a friend of the governor. The Governor of Porto Rico did not in any way know of the $5,000 a year allowance for four years which had been put through the Legislature of Porto Rico for the expenses of Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA, in addition to the salary and mileage allowed him by the United States Government, until he arrived in Porto Rico, and it is plain that the turning down of the payment of that illegal appropriation is the cause of the hatred of Resident Commissioner CORDOVA DAVILA against the governor. There have been some vehement denials by Commissioner CORDOVA DAVILA on the floor of the House regarding this $5,000 allowance. The Commissioner claimed that he refused and did not try to get this money, and said in his speech on the floor of the House on March 2—I quote:

Immediately after the bill carrying this appropriation was passed I published a letter in the newspapers in Porto Rico declining to accept the appropriation. That letter has been published. The next year the legislature made the same appropriation. The matter was brought to the attention of the auditor of Porto Rico, Judge Bonner, without my knowledge. * * * This matter of the appropriation occurred long before Gov. Reily reached Porto Rico * * * when he says that it was stopped when brought to his attention. I am compelled to say he lies, and he knows he lies.

I am going to read to you a copy of a letter to Judge Bonner, which has some bearing on this subject:

(Senate of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R., Antonio R. Barceló, president.)

SAN JUAN, June 21, 1920.

Hon. AUDITOR OF PORTO RICO,
San Juan, P. R.

SIR: In the budget now in force and under the heading "Sundry appropriations" there is an item of $5,000 for the expenses of representation of the Resident Commissioner at Washington.

Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA has had expenses in Washington relying on this item, such as the maintenance of an automobile for himself and other expenses inherent to his representative office, and he is in need of this amount to cover same. I am commissioned by Mr. Cordova to get from you this check appertaining to this sum, or to suggest to you to send it, on or before the 30th day of June now current when the fiscal year will close; and I would appreciate it if you will be pleased to act in respect and notify me for my own government.

Yours, sincerely,

(Signed) ANTO R. BARCELÓ.

(Underscoring is ours.—Ed.)

Judge Bonner was again notified of the desire of Mr. Barceló to collect this money through Gen. McIntyre, as the following cable will show:

(Western Union telegram received at 122 East Huron Street, Ann Arbor, Mich. 169 DE MK 85 GOVT.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 24, 1920.

Judge J. W. BONNER,
1025 Martin Place, Ann Arbor, Mich.:

Following cablegram from Porto Rico for you: "Complying with urgent written and verbal request of Mr. Barceló, I am cabling his request and recommendation that you reconsider decision disallowing appropriation in current budget for expenses of representation of Resident Commissioner of Washington, and that the same be made available prior to June 30. Please have bureau cable reply. McGown, acting auditor." Will be glad to cable your reply.

McINTYRE, Insular Bureau.

* * * Again in 1921 we find Barceló appealing to the auditor to pay the money to CORDOVA. It was a verbal request, but Judge Bonner replied in writing, and makes the nature of the request clear. Judge Bonner's letter follows:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR,
San Juan, P. R., June 8, 1921.

Hon. ANTONIO R. BARCELÓ,
President of the Senate, San Juan, P. R.

MY DEAR MR. BARCELÓ: In compliance with your verbal request I have carefully reconsidered my previous ruling with regard to the appropriation of $5,000 for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico at Washington.

My reasons for declining to set up the first appropriation for the purpose indicated were fully set forth in my letter dated April 3, 1919, to which you are respectfully referred.

In our conversation yesterday you reminded me that the appropriation was not designed to be an increase in salary, but simply as an additional allowance for expenses. I find, however, that such allowances are as completely forbidden by the act of Congress as would be an increase of salary.

After a full reconsideration of the question submitted by yourself, I am prepared to say that I can find no sufficient reason for reaching any other conclusion than that expressed in my letter of April 2, 1919.

Very respectfully,

J. W. BONNER,
Auditor of Porto Rico.

And yet, in the face of this correspondence, conclusive of the fact that Mr. Barceló was making every effort to obtain this money, a period covering three years, Judge FELIX CORDOVA has the nerve to stand on the floor of the House and tell the Members of the House of Representatives that he had "publicly protested" against the appropriation of this money. What can the House, what can Barceló himself, say to this and kindred utterances?

In answer to the statement of CORDOVA DAVILA that Gov. Reily had nothing to do in stopping the payment of this money to him, I have here a statement signed by Judge J. W. Bonner, whom Commissioner CORDOVA DAVILA says in his speech "is one of the most honest and clean men he had ever known in his life."

STATEMENT OF JUDGE J. W. BONNER, FORMER AUDITOR.

SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO,
March 7, 1922.

To the honorable the GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO,
San Juan, Porto Rico.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your verbal inquiry regarding the four annual appropriations of the Legislature of Porto Rico, for the Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico in Washington, I have the honor to report as follows:

1. On April 3, 1919, replying to a verbal request from Hon. Antonio R. Barceló, president of the Senate of Porto Rico, that I render available the appropriation referred to for the benefit of the Resident Commissioner, I sent him a letter in which I respectfully declined to set up the appropriation and gave him in full my reasons therefor.

2. On June 21, 1920, I received a letter from Mr. Barceló in which he states as follows:

"I am commissioned by Mr. DAVILA to get from you this check appertaining to this sum, or to suggest to you to send it on or before the 30th day of June, now current when the fiscal year will close; and I would appreciate it if you will be pleased to act in this respect and notify me for my own government."

I again notified him that I could not set up the appropriation for the reasons theretofore indicated.

3. On June 8, 1921, in response to a verbal request from Mr. Barceló, I again declined to set up the appropriation mentioned for the reasons which had been given in my letter of April 3, 1919.

On Saturday, July 30, 1921, on which date Gov. Reily arrived in Porto Rico, accompanied by Hon. CORDOVA DAVILA, Resident Commissioner, I was informed by the Commissioner that he wished to see me at my office. I cordially invited him to come whenever he found it convenient, but he did not do so. I submitted on the next Monday morning the whole matter of said appropriation to Gov. Reily, and was informed by him that he agreed with my conclusions; that in his opinion no warrant should be issued covering the appropriation to the Commissioner, and he further ordered that I should not set it up on the books of my office, inasmuch as he considered I had obeyed the law throughout the entire transaction.

Very respectfully,

J. W. BONNER,
Former Auditor of Porto Rico.

There are some other things that the Governor of Porto Rico did not know until after he had delivered his inaugural address, the objection to which interfered grievously with the plans of the Coll y Cuchi-Barceló and Davila combination. The governor found that under the direction of these leaders of the Unionist-Independista Party an issue of bonds of $14,250,000 had been authorized by the last legislature, which had appropriated $1,800,000 over and above the tax income. The governor refused to permit the issuance of these bonds for the reason that it would have financially wrecked the island, which is now already bonded for $15,000,000; so in addition to declaring against secession and insisting that the American flag shall be supreme in Porto Rico, the present governor has also protected the treasury and taxpayers of Porto Rico.

That there may be no doubt of the connection between the Resident Commissioner CORDOVA DAVILA, Senator Barceló and Mr. Jones, I will read a copy of a cablegram sent from Washington to Porto Rico on February 11:

FEBRUARY 11, 1922.

BARCELÓ, San Juan:

Jones and I urge strongly that the senate pass a resolution requesting Congress to inquire immediately into the official acts of E. Mont Reily as Governor of Porto Rico, such as removal of judges, intimidation of judiciary, dismissal of efficient officials, appointment of incapable, inefficient, and inexperienced men to office, insulting the people of Porto Rico in speeches by remarks about the flag in Porto Rico, conduct unbecoming a gentleman and a high official, detrimental to the best interests of the United States and of Porto Rico. Jones thinks such resolution, instead of jeopardizing prospects of Campbell bill, would further its cause by creating a national interest in the affairs of Porto Rico.

F. CORDOVA DAVILA.

Does the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, deny sending that cablegram, and does he deny sending this one?

FEBRUARY 15, 1922.

BARCELÓ, San Juan:

Campbell says it should be better for the senate not to adopt the resolution, leaving to me to ask for a congressional investigation if it is necessary. He thinks that the senate ought to act on the merits of the appointments. Judge Towner says that he does not want to express an opinion in the matter. Keep me informed about affairs in Porto Rico regarding Reily.

CORDOVA.

Does the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, deny that he recently cabled Senator Barceló in Porto Rico for money to carry on the fight here against the governor, and will he explain to this House and the country as to whether or not Mr. Barceló in complying with his request, and before he made his speech in Congress, cabled him $600 to the Dupont Bank in Washington, and said in his cable he would send more soon? Will the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, give the date of this transaction and explain to the country as to whether or not that had any influence upon his attack upon the Governor of Porto Rico? Will the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, also explain as to whether or not a cablegram sent by him on February 17, 1922, of which the following is an exact copy—

FEBRUARY 17, 1922.

BARCELÓ, San Juan:

Your cable pleases me very much. Plans actively under way for action in Congress. I will make speech at earliest opportunity, followed by a resolution which will probably be introduced by a Republican.

F. CORDOVA DAVILA.

is an acknowledgment of the receipt of the $600 or in connection with it?

Resident Commissioner CORDOVA DAVILA and Senator Barceló have a splendid press agent. I compliment them upon the misinformation they have given the country through the press. The following cablegrams show their progress:

FEBRUARY 21, 1922.

BARCELÓ, San Juan:

Campaign against Reily launched in full force. New York Times has adopted fight on Reily as a policy of the paper. Do not under any circumstances give in. Am making impeachment speech in Congress tomorrow. Cable developments.

CORDOVA.

FEBRUARY 21, 1922.

BARCELÓ, San Juan:

Your cable received. Am prepared to go the limit. Senate of Porto Rico should pass resolution asking Congress to investigate Reily. Everything here favorable. Press helping us.

CORDOVA.

Will the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, also explain as to who the Mr. Jones is that is described in his cablegram of February 11, 1922, and as to whether or not he is now in Washington engaged in lobbying for the destruction of the American government in Porto Rico? Who pays Mr. Jones's expenses, and who is paying his expenses for his continuous trips to Kansas City, Mo.; and if it is true that the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, stated that Mr. Jones was a wealthy American resident of Porto Rico, who had large interests in Porto Rico, and who was simply interested in the public good of Porto Rico, when, as a matter of fact, he has no residence there? Will the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, deny that on the morning following the inaugural address of E. Mont Reily as Governor of Porto Rico, and before he had killed the $5,000 graft to CORDOVA DAVILA, he, Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA, went to Gov. E. Mont Reily and told him that he must not have anything to do with Mr. Barceló, because he was determined to wreck and ruin the governor's administration? Will the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, deny that he told the Governor of Porto Rico that Mr. Barceló had appointed the biggest crook on the island to an important position; that this crook was a brother of the speaker of the house of representatives of the island, named Jose Coll y Cuchi?

When the governor had finished the official business for which he came to Washington he returned to Porto Rico, and was given a wonderful reception by the people there, who waited all afternoon and far into the night for his boat to reach the pier. I read from the Times, a newspaper of San Juan, published Thursday, January 26, 1922:

GLORIOUS MIDNIGHT WELCOME ACCORDED GOV. REILY—DON MONCHO MARCHES THROUGH THE STREETS AFOOT FROM PIER TO PALACE AT THE HEAD OF THOUSANDS OF HIS ENTHUSIASTIC SUPPORTERS—CITY IS THRILLED BY THE UNPRECEDENTED AND SPONTANEOUS RECEPTION OF THE MAN WHO DECLARES THE FLAG SHALL NOT COME DOWN—"HOME AGAIN; THIS IS MY HOME, AND I AM YOUR GOVERNOR," HE TELLS PEOPLE FROM GALLERY OF FORTALEZA—"VIVA DON MONCHO REYES," YELLS THE EXCITED POPULACE.

Gov. E. Mont Reily is home again—very much at home in Santa Catalina Palace—and still proposes to be governor, he told a huge crowd of enthusiastic citizens gathered under the gallery of Fortaleza at midnight. The governor had been very nearly carried from the steamship Tanamo when the fruit boat arrived from New York and docked, close on to 11.30 p. m.; and then of his own volition he sprung into the midst of the densely packed and cheering crowd outside the pier and walked all the way to the palace, followed and cheered by thousands of enthusiastic citizens afoot and scores of flag-covered automobiles. Never in history has a governor or other official been accorded such a welcome in Porto Rico, and it was so genuine and spontaneous that the whole city was awakened and thrilled with the spectacle.

From an editorial in the same paper I read:

THE GOVERNOR'S RETURN.

* * * * * * *

No governor since the American occupation has received the support of the people of Porto Rico to the extent that these people, the masses of the people, stand ready to support Gov. Reily to-day. The people of Porto Rico regard the political situation as having been outlined, even settled. Porto Rico is sick and tired of politics in the sense that the wrangling, scolding, and pretentious bluffing have become nauseating.

Our people now look for substantial work at the old palace. They expect to see unnecessary employees eliminated. Already much has been accomplished in this direction in the health and interior departments, but the task is by no means finished in those important administrative branches, while the entire government structure is ready for the new broom. Upon the whole the reduction of the budget by department savings has been started.

The people are very desirous of having provision made for sending the rest of the children to school. These are the two important undertakings, or, perhaps we should say, reconstructive works that await the energy and skill centered in and gathered around the executive. The entire field must be gone over, and the task is by no means an easy one or one to be hastily accomplished.

In all of the business details of the government the people expect a great deal of Gov. Reily. They will help him. For the first time in the history of Porto Rico the people, Abraham Lincoln's "common people," have become a factor in the government, and they will make good. They expect the governor to exercise the great power vested in him by law. This people are not afraid of the exercise of power. They resent only its abuse.

Whether the senate will give the governor practically a free hand in choosing his associates and advisers in administering the laws, or whether that body will insist upon choosing his associates for him, we do not know. Much has been cabled and claimed by our Unionist friends who were at the National Capital, and their utterances have been denied by the friends of the governor. It is not worth while to discuss a matter that will so soon be made clear by events.

The governor is warmly welcomed by the people. Some political partisans will, of course, continue on with their grievances, but that situation is unavoidable, and while to be regretted it is not fatal to the success of the work in hand. And now, governor, Porto Rico is ready to "put her shoulder to the wheel" of progress. It but remains for you to give "the high sign," and then you will realize the warmth of your welcome home.

That Gov. Reily has won out in his fight for Americanism in Porto Rico is best proven by the fact that the Unionist Party has recently eradicated from their platform the independence plank that it had been carrying for years, and the story that best tells the almost unanimous desire of the people for the Government that has protected them for the past 25 years is that for the four years previous to Gov. Reily's going to Porto Rico as its governor but 1,600 flags were sold in Porto Rico, while in the half year that he has been governor over 13,000 American flags have been purchased by the people, and to-day in the schools of Porto Rico the children are taught that there is only one flag and one country—"Old Glory and America." But the Barceló-Coll y Cuchi-Davila crowd have not yet given up the fight, and when the names of the governor's cabinet went to the senate they confirmed only the members of the Unionist Party, rejecting the others, and passed a resolution condemning the governor, which has been placed in the RECORD by CORDOVA DAVILA. The governor promptly reappointed the members of his cabinet, as it was necessary to do in order to permit the government to function properly. It suffices to say that one of the members of the cabinet, whose confirmation was rejected by the senate, is the same commissioner of interior who was appointed by President Taft.

Now, they say the governor has dismissed some judges that should not have been removed; that is, if I am able to read the only charges in Mr. CORDOVA DAVILA's long and venomous attack on Mont Reily. Gov. Reily removed a judge at San Juan Sicardo. Reasons given were that there had been filed in his court 740 cases during last year that he had failed to docket. These were cases involving his Unionist friends. Will the Commissioner from Porto Rico deny that there were 740 cases that were not docketed? Will he contend they should not have been docketed? Does he think that the parties involved being Unionists is sufficient reason for the judge to not docket cases against them? The complaint is made of the removal of the secretary of this court. The secretary was short in the neighborhood of $5,000. He is out on a bond. Does the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, want that excused, and does he want the Attorney General to dismiss the case now pending against this man? Another judge was being investigated along similar lines when he sent in his resignation to Gov. Reily. Does the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico desire that Gov. Reily refuse to accept the resignations of judges whose records will not bear investigation? One judge was removed by the governor, and it was afterwards learned that the testimony that was furnished against him was not true, and the governor reinstated him.

I think the experience of the average Member of this House will lead him to be patient with the governor when he is dealing with this testimony in Porto Rico. I recall that Col. Roosevelt, when he was President, removed a certain district attorney. He afterwards found that the testimony upon which he had removed him was false, and reinstated him.

Mr. Chairman, the Resident Commissioner may be able to send a Jones, or some one, to Kansas City to get some affidavit maker drunk who will make an affidavit one way to-day and another to-morrow, but when Theodore Roosevelt told the postmaster at Omaha, who wanted to get pointers as to how he should conduct the post office on a modern plan, to "go to Kansas City and see Mont Reily, who has the most modern and best-conducted office in this country," E. Mont Reily had a testimonial as to his business fitness that can not be destroyed by all the affidavits that Jones can purchase. Later, when Col. Roosevelt was returning from Africa and he sent for Mont Reily to come abroad and accompany him home, Mont Reily received the testimonial of the personal friendship and esteem of the man, which is a better testimonial of his standing among his fellowmen than can be produced by any affidavit. It is true that Mont Reily was for Roosevelt in 1912, but after Col. Roosevelt's defeat in Chicago, Mont Reily advised him to stay with the Republican Party, and Mont Reily has the satisfaction of knowing that Col. Roosevelt lived long enough to say that "you are one of my close friends and advisers that gave me good advice."

But a new propaganda has been started in Porto Rico to serve the same purpose which the independence plank of the Barceló machine was accomplishing—a free State of Porto Rico—which means a government dominated by the Barceló-Coll y Cuchi-Davila machine, with the Old World system of "government by a few," and the resultant exploitation of the people. It is unnecessary to add that this would be the end of Americanism in Porto Rico.

I read from a letter from the United States attorney at Porto Rico, a man from my State, who lived in the district so ably represented by Mr. ANTHONY, who was a judge advocate in the Army during the World War, and for whose high standing, ability, and splendid Americanism every member of the Kansas delegation will vouch:

The taking out of the independence plank in the platform of the Unionist Party means nothing whatever, and is simply to throw dust in the eyes of Congress. People here are not fooled and know that they are just as disloyal as ever.

Gov. Reily is all right in every way and should have the backing of every American. * * * If the American flag means anything to these people it should be made known now. The people of the island are loyal and true, and it is only a few politicians who are off the reservation, and they should be made to see that there is a "God in Israel," and should be made to honor and respect the American flag.

People in the States do not realize the seriousness of this matter to the best interests of the island and are inclined to take it as a joke, but it is no joke here.

If they succeed in breaking Reily, they will break any American governor who can be sent here, and it requires a firm hand, right now and for all time. It is these bills in Congress that give them new hope, and they are furnishing the fuel by which American ideals and American patriotism is being cast upon the block and burned at the stake.

Mr. Chairman, every Member of Congress knows that it is a very easy matter to procure the introduction of a bill in Congress. Mr. Barceló was here for months, and he and Mr. DAVILA were together, and together they called upon many Members of Congress. The so-called Campbell bill is not the only bill that was introduced for Porto Rican independence. The scheme was to get a bill introduced in the House and then for the Unionist Party to use the fact that a bill had been introduced as though it was practically a law, and by such use of the bill it has had a tendency to destroy good government in Porto Rico.

Also, every Member of this House knows that there has been no serious thought by any considerable number of the American Congress to even consider any of these measures that have been introduced. The president of the Senate of Porto Rico knew it. CORDOVA DAVILA knows this fact. It is possible that the propaganda of having these bills introduced and these cablegrams exchanged is for the purpose of raising and creating a sentiment that will enable certain persons to raise money in Porto Rico to be used against the American flag. If this construction of the use they are putting these bills to is correct, then Members of Congress should be reluctant to extend the ordinary courtesy of introducing a bill at the request of these parties. It is well understood in this country that almost anyone who has an idea thinks he ought to be engaged in securing some Congressman willing to put that idea in the form of a bill in the basket on the Speaker's desk. It is just as well understood in this country that that bill is no nearer a law then than it was when it had its original inception in the mind of the propagandist, and no notice whatever is paid to the fact that a bill has been introduced. I am able to state that the introduction of these bills has been given publicity in Porto Rico by the Barceló-Cordova Davila crowd for the purpose of raising funds to carry on their propaganda work and help their political situation.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I desire to observe that the facts and information I have furnished the House in this address are, of course, known to the administration in Washington, and perhaps it is unnecessary to add that they would not be discussed in Congress save and except for the fact that the Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, has placed some statements in the RECORD. President Harding, the Secretary of War, and several departments of our Government charged with the administration of affairs are fully informed as to conditions, and to anyone who is willing to take time to make investigation there is nothing surprising in the fact that the President has not seen fit, at the request of the Secessionists and Independistas, to remove his appointee in Porto Rico.

The Resident Commissioner, CORDOVA DAVILA, has spoken in favor of an investigation. If he really wants one, I am requested by the friends of Gov. Reily to say that they will welcome it, but they desire to have the investigation include the management of the public affairs of Porto Rico by the Barceló-Coll y Cuchi-Davila organization, so that the reasons and the need for Gov. Reily's clean-up of its government offices and the discharge of incompetent, useless, and grafting officials and employees was necessary. If we are going to interfere in the President's administration of the affairs of Porto Rico, let us get all the facts.

When this tempest in the teapot has passed the American administration in Porto Rico will go forward to the great good of the Porto Ricans, who are naturally a loyal, patriotic people, and who will realize that the people of the United States want nothing from them but their assistance to uphold the American flag and American ideals. They are now American citizens—the highest honor in the world to-day. They may always depend upon our cooperation, assistance, and protection. We hope that the present governor may succeed in having our language taught in the public schools equal with that of Spanish, in order that they may better understand our system of government and our national ideals, and in stamping out any attempt to separate the island of Porto Rico and its people from us. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 16 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the administration of no other governmental activity has provoked so much complaint and dissatisfaction as have those which pertain to the care and well-being of our ex-service men of the World War.

It was so continuous and general, without reference to class or section, that it finally culminated in the enactment of the Sweet bill, approved August 9, 1921, by which was established the Veterans' Bureau.

The proponents of the bill claimed that the legislation would lessen expense by coordinating governmental activities, and that its provisions for organizing regional offices would facilitate action on all matters involved. It is now admitted by department officials that the operation of the regional offices increases the annual expense of the bureau from fourteen to fifteen million dollars.

So much has been said regarding the service and the decentralization of the bureau since the passage of the act that I was induced to make what under the surrounding circumstances and opportunities may be considered an exhaustive study of the results obtained. The facts are such that I believe they should be brought to the attention of the House, and I therefore ask its indulgence for that purpose.

There are embraced in the Veterans' Bureau what was prior to its creation the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, also those activities of the Federal Board for Vocational Education which related to the rehabilitation of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines, and those of the Public Health Service which relate to beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, except such as had to do with hospitals and dispensaries.

The act authorizes the director of the bureau to establish a central office in the District of Columbia and not more than 14 regional offices and 140 suboffices in the territory of the United States and its outlying possessions.

Incompetency is always deplorable. Waste of public funds may be pardoned in times of war but not in times of peace.

If reports be true the waste and loss which the Government will probably sustain as a result of incompetency or carelessness in the management of affairs by some of these regional offices is little short of crime. For instance, persons heretofore receiving compensation, allotments, or allowances have had such payments reduced or discontinued altogether at the central office, but it is said that checks for the usual amounts have gone to them by error from the district offices. In some offices, it is said, they have amounted to millions of dollars.

In this connection I may add that on yesterday I called the attention of an employee occupying a responsible position in the bureau to a report which had come to me to the effect that shortage exists by reason of such action in some of the regional offices. I was informed an investigation had been made of the New York and Philadelphia offices but no report had yet been submitted. I was also advised that an investigation of the Atlanta regional office had been ordered and that it would be made at once. I then stated to the party that I had been told a shortage of a million or more dollars exists in the Atlanta office. If such funds were sent to persons who accepted and spent them in good faith, the recipient has certainly committed no crime; and if they are not financially able to repay, the Government must lose.

I have to-day introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate the Veterans' Bureau, especially as to errors and shortage at regional offices.

It is not always safe to depend upon statements of the cashier as to the solvency of the bank, nor even to rely upon the directors of the institution, for it might not be to their interest to disclose its embarrassment or insolvency. It is upon this principle that we rely upon the official bank examiner in both State and Federal matters for accurate information wherein the public interest is involved.

Upon this theory, I believe a congressional investigation as to the Veterans' Bureau would satisfy and best serve the public demands.

The issues involved center largely around the question of decentralization of the bureau. Is decentralization wise or unwise? Certainly there is much dissatisfaction as to the results obtained. At no time since we have been dealing with the problem of disabled ex-service men has complaint been more general or dissatisfaction better founded. If decentralization is wise, apparently the affairs of the regional offices are in the hands of incompetent persons or carelessness and negligence prevail. If the system is a failure, we should change it; if its administration is wrong, we should correct it.

I incorporate a statement furnished by the bureau which shows the location of the regional offices, the rent to be paid for each, and the amount for suboffices. It discloses that we are paying an annual rental of $1,094,884.78 for regional offices and $577,294.11 for suboffices, a total of $1,672,178.89. None of this is for Washington quarters, nor is any necessary for that purpose. If this is necessary for the comfort or better care of disabled ex-service men, of course no one will object; but if its chief purpose or result is to further enrich opulent landlords, objection will come from every quarter. [Applause.]

But rent is only a small portion of additional expense incurred. By far the largest item results from increase in number of employees.

In the formation of the Veterans' Bureau the entire force of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was taken over. It consisted of 5,025 employees. There were transferred from the Federal Board for Vocational Education 6,710 employees and from the Public Health Service 4,021, making a total of 15,756 employees.

Regarding personnel of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1921, page 432, discloses that—

> The annual net reduction in the bureau's personnel for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921—
> Less than 40 days before creation of the Veterans' Bureau—
> amounted to 2,767 employees, or a net reduction of approximately 35.2 per cent.

In view of this well-known tendency toward reduction of such employees, I think it may be assumed that Members of Congress voting for the bill did not expect the personnel of the Veterans' Bureau to be greatly increased over the number comprising its initial organization. If so, they have certainly been doomed to disappointment, for there are at this time not 15,756 persons employed in the bureau but 19,633, an increase of 3,859 in about seven months.

Not only is this true, but the Public Health Service, from which was taken many of its activities and 4,021 employees in the organization of the Veterans' Bureau, has reorganized its forces by adding to the pay roll 2,927 more employees, an increase of more than 15 per cent. A statement furnished by the Public Health Service March 4, 1922, shows that the total personnel of the service was 22,444 on July 1, 1921, and that it consisted of 21,340 employees on February 28, 1922, practically the same as prior to disenrollment for the Veterans' Bureau.

I incorporate a statement furnished by the Veterans' Bureau which shows the number of employees in the central office and each of the regional offices; the average, the minimum, and the maximum salary paid at each office and the number receiving the maximum salary. It will be seen that the average salary paid is $1,479.60 per annum. Thus, it will require on the present basis of employment $29,048,968.80 per annum to pay basic salaries of the 19,633 employees of the regional offices. The bonus paid employees will add, it is estimated, $1,694,327.90; and thus, including the $6,115,542, estimated to be necessary for salaries in operation of the central office, the total amount to be paid for salaries alone is $36,858,838.70.

There are 5,016 persons employed in the central office. The salary of the director of the bureau is $10,000 per annum. One other person in the central office receives a salary of $7,500 per annum, six receive $6,000 each, one receives $5,500, and seven receive $5,000 each. The report discloses that 17 other officials embraced in the various regional offices receive annual salaries ranging approximately from $5,000 to $6,000 per annum. Some of the regional offices have less than 500 employees—the greatest has approximately 1,600—yet the heads of these regional offices receive practically as much salary as did the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance when it had enrolled 17,336 employees. I believe his salary was about $6,000 per annum.

The service rendered may be worth the money. It may be impossible to obtain efficient men for a less sum; but at a time when 700,000 deserving ex-service men walk the street and beg for employment, and when complaint regarding service rendered, especially as to regional offices, is so widespread, the public will wonder whether these high-paid officials are indispensable. [Applause.] The people will not be willing to have the bureau made a haven for high-paid officials who do not satisfy demands for efficiency.

The law does not require the establishment of 14 regional offices. It simply limits the number to be established. The director is clothed with full and complete authority to terminate any regional office or suboffice when in his judgment this may be done without detriment to the administration of the act.

The service obtained is far from satisfactory in results. Almost everyone in position to know and who has spoken upon the question has so testified. It is useless for me to cite particular instances coming within my own knowledge, though I might mention many. In view of these conditions, would it not be well for the director to consider the advisability of closing the regional offices and adopting some other system of dealing with the situation?

More than a year ago Congress appropriated $18,600,000 to provide hospital facilities and 6,000 new beds for our disabled ex-service men. Not a hospital has been completed nor a single bed made available under this appropriation. Not only this but a recent report of the Treasury discloses that in some instances not even sites for the proposed hospitals have been acquired.

We have more than 9,000 disabled ex-service men in contract hospitals, mostly private, profit-making institutions. They are costing the Government an average of $3.50 per day each—a daily expenditure of $32,000. They could be cared for in Government hospitals at a saving of from $12,000 to $15,000 per day. Most of these men do not receive vocational training, nor are such facilities afforded them. The Government has little or no opportunity for determining when a patient has sufficiently recuperated to be discharged from these hospitals, and it is not greatly to the interest of the institutions to disclose such information. In many instances the ex-service men are dissatisfied with the services rendered.

Who is to blame for such delay and extravagance? Congress can only appropriate money. It is not expected to build hospitals, or to equip them, but some one is charged with responsibility, and the country should know who it is and why the delay.

The American Legion Weekly of March 3 calls attention to this frightful condition. It says that we now have more than 30,000 patients in Government hospitals; that the number is expected to increase rather than decrease, and that by 1925 the number will probably reach 35,000. Present facilities are taxed to their full capacity. Many others are suffering, yet few can be admitted until hospital facilities are provided.

Those in authority meet the existing emergency only with delay and procrastination. Meanwhile the public does not know whether collusion and desire to benefit private institutions prevent action.

The disabled ex-service man is entitled to every consideration. He is dissatisfied with the results obtained. It is not only the duty of Congress to fix responsibility for delay and inefficiency, but to correct conditions immediately.

To obtain for these brave men who fought that liberty might live, who are to-day wrecks that freedom might survive for yours and mine, all things which may help them is due. I, for one, though criticism may follow and misunderstanding arise, shall continue to call these matters to the attention of Congress until justice be done and suffering alleviated so far as it may be.

I am actuated by no mere desire to criticise, but by the hope that constructive criticism may enable us to discharge the debt due to these soldier lads of ours. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as one can not expect to go very deeply into the philosophy of the organization of the Military Establishment and the reasons for its being in 15 minutes I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I do not think anybody who is cognizant with public affairs in these days would seriously attempt to deny the necessity for great and oftentimes radical economies in the administration of our various bureaus and departments of Government, and in the control of the activities of the many agencies and institutions of Government. It is not debatable. But I think the American people generally, in whose name we profess occasionally to appeal for economy, are not themselves individually and collectively in their community and home life such radical economists as sometimes their distinguished Representatives undertake to say they are.

The American people do not want their money misspent, but they do not begrudge the money that is necessary to be spent in order to have good government and security in their social order. Sometimes I am inclined to think, with all good nature, that some gentlemen in public life who preach economy vociferously and say they are speaking in the name of the people are much in the attitude of a man standing at the mouth of Mammoth Cave hallooing his speech into it, and then, when the echo of his own words comes rumbling back, calling it "public opinion."

I think a good deal of so-called public opinion is manufactured upon the floor of this House in about that kind of a way.

I think it is equally true that, if we were this very night to make a little quiet canvas of the homes of the land and ask them if they have taken particular note of the figures in the Army appropriation bill and the theory upon which it proposes to reduce the Regular Establishment and the other military activities that depend upon it, they would tell us they had not done so and, what is more, that they were not aware that there was any particular necessity for such a reduction.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. For a brief question.

Mr. GARNER. With reference to the statement of sentiment being made in the House of Representatives, does not the gentleman believe that if the House of Representatives should take the leadership of the country according to its convictions the country would be better off?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think that is probably true of all popular government when the mandate of an election represents the true political sentiment.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, if we undertook to educate our people in their thought rather than find out what they wanted and attempt to benefit them, that would be the better policy?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is true; but most of us are human.

Mr. GARNER. And the gentleman might say that we want to be elected.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is human, too.

So I do not think there need be so much concern about a popular demand for economy respecting the figures involved in the Military Establishment when those figures do not run beyond reason. There should be some basis of common sense back of all action of this kind, and there should not be any indiscriminate reduction without regard as to whether we are going to keep the governmental agency in a live condition and in such a vitality that even though it is required to retrench somewhat it will not be left in such shape that it will be unable to carry on the purposes for which it was originally instituted.

Back in my country there is an old, old story of the man who tried a drastic experiment in economy, and it has become proverbial. He said he had just got his horse up to the point where he was going without eating "when he up and died." [Laughter.] I often think of that in connection with some of these institutions for which we legislate.

I can see places in the Military Establishment where economies can be effected. If the Committee on Military Affairs had been allowed to continue in the work they were endeavoring to do, and had been allowed to bring into the House a scheme whereby the War Department might unload a great many thousands of acres of useless real estate, which now entails considerable overhead charge for its administration, and various other things which the committee have been trying to do, thus reducing the total cost of the Military Establishment, which now is always charged up in the popular mind to maintenance of so-called militarism, the figures for the War Department's annual budget would be more nearly representing the expense that the real, true military service carries as nearly as it can be measured in dollars.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can not in my time.

It is an old fallacy I have often spoken of a good many times here by which people who do not approve of what they call militarism attempt to divide the total which they find charged off on the books against the War Department by the number of soldiers who are maintained, and then say militarism costs so much per capita. Then they proceed to "economize" in the cost of the Army by reducing the number of soldiers. If they would only take out of that total the great sums, such as rivers and harbors and various other activities which are nonmilitary, not directly pertaining to the military defense in any shape or manner, we would not have such a cry in reference to economy in the Military Establishment, or the clamor that we must reduce the personnel of the Army in order to economize. If we did, we would not have so much of a cry of how much it is costing for our Army. We ought to have a common-sense idea of economies which we know are necessary at this time.

I am sure we would also agree upon the proposition that that governmental agency whose existence was absolutely necessary—and we do not deny that the Army is a necessity, due to world and social conditions—we would also agree that it was a wise thing for the health of that agency if the Nation adopted something like a permanent policy regarding its maintenance and its continuance from year to year, so that men who undertook to go into the Army and the Military Establishment and make the profession of arms a life career would have some reasonable assurance before them that if they did so they were going to be able to continue in stable employment, provided, of course, they were efficient according to a fair standard or, in the language of the time, "made good."

But if we go on year after year taking a new hack at the Army on one pretense and another, one speculation and another, and continually make life within that professional circle uncertain and altogether risky and experimental, how long will it be before we get to the point where the right kind of young men will see that the Army means no career for anybody; that they can not get anywhere with it? And then we will not get the kind of material that we want.

I should like to summarize, and just touch the high point in the summarization, one of the lessons that was learned as the result of the great World War. All people who study military affairs in general know that it stands out as one of the most prominent and, in a degree, one of the expensive lessons learned in the great World War. That was that we did not go into that war with a sufficient number of highly trained, experienced, and matured commissioned officers in our Regular Establishment. I do not think anybody who has ever given any thought to that question will dispute that for a moment. As a result, we tried in the adoption of the Army reorganization act, deliberately and avowedly, to create a larger commissioned personnel than there was any necessity for if the officers in it were to be employed exclusively with troops. It was done designedly and avowedly. And when some of the brethren undertake to show that we have no reason for so many enlisted men, or when we cut down the enlisted men we do not need so many officers, they are arguing against the philosophy of the law which we adopted.

It would take more time than has been allotted to me to show how those officers are employed, but the theory of the law is that they shall be kept in circulation, first, performing duties with troops, and then being sent for a while to school, and then on detached service of one kind and another in some one of the Military Establishment's functions and activities, while most of the surplus officers are employed throughout the country in the business of training the National Guard, in acting as instructors for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and in training in schools and colleges where they have military units of young citizens preparing for the defense of the country in time of need.

I agree with you that in order to fix the number of officers beyond the necessary number required for the tactical units there must be a compromise, but I think it is a dangerous thing to compromise on the wrong side on that number. I think the time will never come when we shall be able to get along in this country with any less than the number we have now, and we find now that the demands all over the country for these officers to help in training and teaching and instructing the civilian population to prepare for national defense are more than the War Department can answer. And they have to rob the tactical units they maintain to-day in order to get many of the officers to put at this work. The organizations of enlisted men are short of officers, and have been for years, and yet the call comes for officers to come out and train the civilian population.

Again, I want to impress upon your minds something you know already, but which I think we ought to carry into the debate when the bill is read under the five-minute rule. We shall hear some rather emphatic and exaggerated statements made in the enthusiasm of some of our economical friends, and I think we ought to keep them closely in mind. We have never maintained in this country a fighting Army in time of peace, nor is it intended by the Army reorganization act that we shall do so. It is simply a garrison, police, and training Army. We wisely rely upon calling our entire population to arms in time of war, and thus avoid maintaining a great standing Army in time of peace. Men say we are not going to have war with foreign countries by reason of the Limitation of Armament Conference. The whole world knows that we do not maintain a war Army, but we did maintain a Navy that was practically ready for war. The Limitation of Arms Conference never asked that our Army be reduced.

Moreover, if there is no danger of our having a foreign war immediately—and that is quite likely, as the world is exhausted to-day—perhaps this generation may never see another; yet if there was ever a time in the history of man when it may be necessary to employ force to maintain our Government against radical manifestations of social upheaval and threatened insurrection, it is this very day and time when all the world is laboring under a well-nigh feverish unrest and discontent. We may think ourselves very lucky that we have not had many more radical examples of what may come of that social unrest in our own land, and yet we can not tell when they will come or when we will have need for just such an organization as this Army of ours.

I want to impress on your mind again that it is the commissioned personnel of an army, under our American system, that is the only permanent Military Establishment we have. And those commissioned officers are what we mainly rely upon in time of peace to prepare our great civilian population for national defense in time of war. Enlisted men come and go in and out of the Regular Army, but the science of war has become too complicated in these days to be learned by volunteer officers in the few weeks that an emergency army of citizens has for training when called to the colors in time of war. As an evidence of this, please take note that the recent British Army estimates, while they propose a reduction in the enlisted personnel, at the same time actually propose an increase of 4,000 in the number of commissioned officers. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I append herewith a report, to accompany H. R. 10271, entitled "Reduction of officers of the Regular Army." This report, which I made for the Committee on Military Affairs, gives in somewhat greater detail than I have been able to discuss in my limited time here, some idea of the reason why the commissioned personnel of the Army should not be reduced to the extent proposed in the Army appropriation bill now before the House:

REDUCTION OF OFFICERS OF THE REGULAR ARMY.

[Report to accompany H. R. 10271.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10271) to reduce the number of officers of the Regular Army, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

One of the outstanding lessons of the World War was the modern army's need of great numbers of highly trained, experienced, and matured commissioned officers. The wise policy of the people of the United States has been not to maintain a huge standing Army in peace time ready for the battle field at any call, but to keep a comparatively small professional Army in time of peace for garrison, police, and training purposes, and to rely upon armies of citizen soldiers in emergency for national defense. This professional Army is required to educate, discipline, and train itself for any emergency at any time, and one of its most important missions is to conduct the education and training in military science of the National Guard, Organized Reserves, and other civilians and civilian agencies and institutions so that there may be no necessity for the maintenance of a great war-strength army in time of peace.

When the Army reorganization act of June 4, 1920, was drawn, it authorized a strength of 17,726 commissioned officers for the Regular or permanent Military Establishment. This number of officers were designedly far more than would be needed simply to supply officers for the various tactical organizations of the Army or for its normal peace-time administration and overhead. But it was recognized that the commissioned personnel is the only permanent part of the Regular Army, as the enlisted men come and go with their varying terms of enlistment. It was the philosophy of the law that a number of officers varying with the needs of the time would be detailed to duty with troops or for administration and overhead, that others would be sent to the various service schools of the Army, others still to various duties and responsibilities which are by law placed under the War Department, such as rivers and harbors work, for one instance, and that the body of commissioned officers remaining would be utilized in the various agencies concerned in the training of civilians and civilian or nonprofessional military organizations, as already indicated. It was the idea of the law that the officers would be kept in circulation throughout these activities, serving for a period with troops; then perhaps going to a service school to acquire additional proficiency in their profession; then detailed once more to some administration, staff, or other overhead duty; then to the agencies of civilian training if fitted for that particular duty; and so on, roundabout, going back to troops frequently in order always to be close in touch with the actual Army and its everyday life and necessities.

It is the theory of the law that experience in these duties is essential to the Army and that officers in peace time should not only be trained in line duties but in administration, staff work, and similar responsibilities which experience shows will instantly be enormously enlarged and complicated upon the outbreak of a war and the raising of millions of men in citizen armies to take the field. It is the theory of the law, moreover, that while the small number of regular officers maintained over and above the exact requirements of the number of troops in the peace-time standing army can not be anywhere near sufficient to fill the higher grades in a war-time army, it is a number that will go some way by sprinkling through the great war-time army and helping to leaven the whole lump with some of the necessary ideas of military science and discipline, fill many of the most responsible high commands for which a sufficient number of citizen soldiers are not then prepared, and in general help raise, equip, and train the soldiers of the war-time army during the organization period, as was demonstrated during the recent war. These and many other similar details will at once suggest themselves as being most important functions for the commissioned personnel of the Regular Establishment in such an emergency when a whole nation of ordinarily peace-loving and nonmilitary people must be hurriedly put in shape for war.

As the Regular Army is operating to-day and long has been, there are not enough officers assigned to duties with troops according to the requirements in the tables of organization. The reason for this is that the civilian training has made such demands upon the commissioned strength that the troops have been deprived of the necessary tactical officers in order to go some way toward meeting this demand from the public.

It is not correct to say that in proportion as the enlisted strength of an army is reduced its overhead may also be reduced. There is about so much overhead required anyway for any army of any strength. Besides, it is regarded as very urgent that officers should have training in administration and staff duties as well as in duties pertaining strictly to the line because the war-time army needs tremendous administration overheads and increase in staff corps. One of the most emphasized lessons of the World War was our lack of training in military staff functions.

In attempting to estimate the number of commissioned officers necessary to an army it is a mistake to divide the number of enlisted men by the total number of officers and then to argue that we have an army made up of "one officer to so many enlisted men." The commissioned personnel of an army does not stand in any such ratio to the enlisted men. The various tactical organizations are not officered alike, some requiring many more officers than others, and many military functions are necessarily performed by officers who are not attached to troops at all.

Accordingly, when the Army reorganization act became law it provided for an increase in the commissioned personnel of all grades, and under the terms of the law several thousand former emergency officers in the World War were inducted into the Regular Army in various grades and the remaining vacancies were filled by promotions of the Regulars already in the service. As a matter of fact, however, it developed that not a sufficient number of emergency officers and other civilians applied for or were found qualified for admission into the Regular Army to fill all the vacancies created by the Army reorganization act, and as the law directed the upper grades to be filled as suggested it came about as a natural result that the higher grades became filled to their authorized strength, leaving the grade of second lieutenant wholly unfilled and considerable vacancies in the grade of first lieutenant besides. All this, it should be clearly understood, took place according to the very terms of the law itself, which in its turn followed the practice of military law for many years.

It should be borne in mind that if the Army reorganization act had gone into effect completely because sufficient applications had been made or accepted for vacancies created by it all the promotions made necessary by the act would have been en bloc, and would have attracted no public attention whatever because they were in obedience to the law, which provided for just such an increase in the commissioned personnel and all its grades. But the failure to fill the vacancies has meant that the promotion process has been strung out over a period going on two years, from time to time operating upon succeeding groups of officers as the files above them became vacant through natural causes, all tending to create the erroneous impression in some quarters, apparently, that the War Department itself was pursuing a ridiculous policy of building up a top-heavy Army that did not even have a second lieutenant in it.

The failure of sufficient applications for commissions in the Regular Army to fill the vacancies created by the Army reorganization act, therefore, has left the Regular Army in an absurd top-heavy condition with regard to the higher grades of its commissioned personnel. This the Army itself recognizes in the hindrance it is to the proper performance of its functions under military law and practice, and the War Department has sought some remedy for it for some time. The remedy now proposed is in the form of the bill H. R. 10271, which is now reported to the House.

This bill is the offer of the War Department itself to cure the existing situation. It keeps the commissioned personnel within a total of 13,000 for a year from July 1, 1923, and does not permit an excess of 14,000 beyond that time until Congress itself shall authorize such an increase. It redistributes the officers in appropriate numbers in the various grades to do away with the top-heaviness that is so apparent even to a layman, puts a restriction upon promotions, so that they will cease or slow up for some time, introduces the stranger known as a second lieutenant to the Army again, and provides that he shall stay in that grade for at least three years. It does these and other things, all in the interest of a well-balanced commissioned personnel of a professional Army, and many of which will be found to mean a very decided economy over the operations of the law as it stands to-day.

A complete analysis of the bill is shown in the following memorandum of the War Department prepared for the use of this committee:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, March 11, 1922.

Memorandum for the chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

Subject: H. R. 10271.

I. PURPOSE OF THE BILL.

The purposes of H. R. 10271 are threefold: First, to suspend for the time being the authorization for officers of the act of June 4, 1920, and to substitute therefor a new authorization for about 4,000 less officers suitably distributed in grades and branches, thereby giving a definite guide for future administration of the commissioned personnel of the Army; second, to bring about a prompt, economical, and efficient readjustment of the present officer personnel to conform to the new authorization, and thereby remedy the existing unsatisfactory distribution and flow of promotion; and, third, to improve the general quality and effectiveness of the reduced officer body by an elimination of the least effective and by resuming the inflow of new blood in the lowest grade.

II. POLICIES GOVERNING FRAMING OF THE BILL.

The bill has been framed in accordance with carefully considered and broad policies. These may best be serially stated in broad terms as follows:

1. The minimum number of regular officers that can be maintained in the immediate future and effectively perform the missions that in our scheme of national defense devolve upon such officers is 13,000. As the development of the reserve forces progresses a thousand more officers will be required. These may, according to circumstances, be either obtained by appointment in the Regular Army or obtained by placing junior reserve officers on active duty for limited periods. In either case the distribution of officers among the grades above the lowest should properly be on the basis of a total of 14,000 officers.

2. In reducing the number of officers at present in various grades above the lowest to conform to the new schedule the most efficient and economical method to pursue is a selective retirement and discharge of those officers who for any reason are least effective. The alternative methods are:

First, what is technically known as absorption, which means a suspension of promotions until, by normal causes such as death, retirement, resignation, etc., the surplus in any grade has disappeared. This method is not favored as it is slow, uneconomical, produces stagnation in promotion, prevents appointment of new blood in the lowest grade, and negatives any improvement in efficiency by not affording any opportunity for selective elimination.

Second, what is technically known as demotion, which means the recommissioning of officers in lower grades. This method has all the disadvantages of absorption except that it is more economical. It has the additional disadvantage of lowering morale by loss of rank and pay.

The method of selective elimination by retirement and discharge has all the advantages and none of the disadvantages of the alternative methods.

3. Officers eliminated on account of being surplus are entitled to reasonable compensation on account of the premature termination of their active service.

4. In order to avoid too great an elimination of junior officers, to have available for service a few extra junior officers during the period of building up the quota of second lieutenants, and to slow up promotions in those lower grades in which it has been unduly rapid, a portion of the reduction should be accomplished by the method of absorption.

5. Greater latitude in meeting the problem of reorganization and readjustment than the 15 per cent latitude now allowed by law is essential in the distribution of officers to the various branches of the service.

III. ANALYSIS OF THE BILL.

Section 1: This section accomplishes the following:

First. It leaves the authorized number of general officers, medical officers, Medical Administrative Corps officers, chaplains, professors, and the military storekeeper as at present authorized.

Second. It suspends for the time being certain provisions of the national defense act and reduces by 17.6 per cent the authorized number of officers in each grade from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive.

Third. It reduces the authorized strength of the Veterinary Corps to 144, of the Dental Corps to 177, and of the chaplains to 136.

Fourth. It keeps the commissioned strength within 13,000 at least until July 1, 1923.

Fifth. It causes the authorized strength of the branches of the Medical Department and chaplains to remain fixed, instead of fluctuating with the enlisted strength, as they do at present.

Sixth. It requires that hereafter every second lieutenant serve at least three years in that grade before being eligible for promotion. This provision assures such vacancies as may exist being distributed in the grades of first and second lieutenant.

The total commissioned strength, as authorized by this section, is as shown in Appendix A.

Section 2: This section accomplishes the following:

First. For a period of five months, during which retirements and discharges are accomplished, it stops all promotions among the officers who receive promotion by seniority. By this means every ordinary vacancy that occurs during the five-month period serves to accomplish a part of the required reduction, thereby lessening the number to be eliminated by other means.

Second. It cancels all unfilled vacancies existing when the act is passed. In this way a further part of the necessary reduction in each grade is accomplished without the elimination of officers.

Section 3: This section accomplishes the following:

First. It fixes the number in the various grades to which reduction must be made within five months of passage of the act. The reduction required by this section will, in general, bring the various branches and grades to the new authorized strength as fixed by section 1 of the act. However, to avoid an excessive elimination and to slow up promotion to the grades of major and captain, a number of additional officers enumerated in the section are excluded from the elimination to be made within five months. These additional officers are authorized only during the time necessary for their number to reduce to zero by the normal losses that will occur.

Second. There being no surplus of first lieutenants, the section merely provides for the President to use his discretion in eliminating or releasing any that he may deem it to the best interests of the Government to eliminate or release.

Section 4: This section accomplishes the following:

First. It provides for a board of five general officers to select, under regulations approved by the Secretary of War and subject to his approval, the officers who should, for any reason, be declared supernumerary and be subject to retirement or discharge in accomplishing the immediate reduction required by the preceding section of the act. This board will be disinterested and impartial, being senior to all officers who come under its operations. It will operate under the close supervision of the Secretary of War. The numbers selected by this board will be only those necessary to supplement the reduction by normal casualties in bringing about the total required reduction. For example, the number of colonels is reduced by 105. If, by cancellation of unfilled vacancies, retirement on application and for physical disability, and by other normal processes, a reduction of 60 is brought about, the board will be authorized and required to select only the remaining 45 to be declared supernumerary and retired.

Second. The proviso of this section insures a reasonable portion of the reduction in the Medical Department being made in all grades. For example, a total reduction of 8 per cent being required in the Medical Corps, this proviso would require a reduction of 8 per cent of the actual number of colonels, of lieutenant colonels, and of majors of that corps. The effect of the proviso is to insure reaching the least effective in each grade and to prevent elimination of really effective officers in any grade.

Section 5: This section accomplishes the following:

First. Within the limits of the reduction required in the Army it affords an opportunity for officers to apply for retirement or discharge with the same compensation as though selected by the board as supernumerary officers. By this means there will be a large voluntary reduction, obviating an equal nonvoluntary elimination.

Second. It provides authority for the President, in his discretion, to place upon the retired list any officer eligible to be retired upon his own request.

Section 6: This section contains the specific authority to retire and discharge supernumerary officers and fixes the compensation they are to receive. Officers of over 10 years' service, who are retired, are to receive 3 per cent pay per year for each year of service. This provision is similar to that already made by law for the inefficient class B officers, the difference being a rate of pay of 3 per cent instead of 2½ per cent. This slight increase is due the officers eliminated on account of being surplus to differentiate between them and the absolutely inefficient officer who gets into class B. Officers of less than 10 years' service are discharged with a year's pay for five years' service or for a major fraction thereof. This also corresponds closely to the compensation provided for class B officers of less than 10 years' service, and also corresponds closely to a provision of the act of June 30, 1882, for the discharge and compensation of supernumerary officers.

The constructive service provisions of this section make reasonable provision for officers who have attained their present places other than by the normal process of promotion. In general, the effect of the bill is to credit each such officer with the same service as the officer next senior to him who did reach his place by the normal process of promotion. In other words, the position of an officer is recognized without question or discrimination as to the route or means by which he got there.

Section 7: This section merely prevents appointments in the Medical Department and of chaplains until the surplus in those branches has disappeared.

Section 8: This section authorizes, with their consent, the use of reserve officers on active duty when, due to unfilled vacancies in the Regular Army, reserve officers are needed and funds are available for their payment.

Section 9: This section accomplishes a redistribution of the reduced quota of officers among the various branches of the Army. The resulting relative proportions in various branches will be as now authorized by law, except that in meeting the problems of readjustment and reorganization the President may increase or diminish any branch by not more than 35 per cent.

SUMMARY.

In general, this bill will bring about within five months a reduction of the commissioned strength from the present number of 12,907 to about 12,000. This opens the way for a resumption of the appointment of second lieutenants. During the fiscal year 1923 such appointments may be made within a total strength of 13,000 officers. Thereafter further appointments may be made within such total strength, not exceeding 14,000 in any case, as funds appropriated permit. If Congress shall see fit to continue the limiting strength of 13,000, only such appointments will be made as are necessary to offset losses, junior reserve officers being used in place of the 1,000 appointments not to be made so long as the limit of 13,000 is continued.

This bill presents a logical and scientific method of bringing about an economical and desirable reduction and readjustment. It embodies the manifestly businesslike course of first dropping the least effective personnel. It goes as far as it is safe to go without seriously crippling the military service. To go further than this bill provides will undoubtedly cause to be eliminated and lost to the Government service officers who are thoroughly competent and efficient and who can not be spared if we are to have, as everyone knows we must have, an efficient and sufficient corps of professional officers.

Not the least of the virtues of the bill is the avoidance of demotion, a disheartening and demoralizing process that would drive many good officers out of the service, and, by blasting prospects of future promotion, would reduce greatly the effectiveness of those who remain.

The effects of the bill in tabular form are illustrated by the table in Appendix D. There are also appended hereto tables showing the distribution by grades and the functional distribution of the present officers of the Army.

[H. R. 10271, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session.]

A bill to reduce the number of officers of the Regular Army, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter there shall be officers of the Regular Army as now authorized by law except that, until it shall be determined by Congress that conditions justify maintenance of the numbers now provided by the act of June 4, 1920, there shall be 494 colonels, 555 lieutenant colonels, 1,850 majors, 3,700 captains, 5,735 lieutenants, including first and second lieutenants and of whom not to exceed 3,515 may be first lieutenants, 1,053 officers of the Medical Corps, 177 officers of the Dental Corps, 144 officers of the Veterinary Corps, 81 officers of the Medical Administrative Corps, and 136 chaplains: Provided, That, until July 1, 1923, the total number of officers shall not exceed 13,000. Hereafter no officer whose name is carried on the promotion list shall be promoted to the grade of first lieutenant until he shall have served at least three years in the grade of second lieutenant. The number of officers herein prescribed for any grade or branch shall not be exceeded except as authorized by this act. Hereafter the number of officers of the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Medical Administrative Corps, and chaplains shall be as prescribed herein, notwithstanding any changes that may be made in the authorized enlisted or commissioned strength of the Regular Army.

SEC. 2. That for five months after the date of approval of this act there shall be no promotions of officers of the Regular Army to any grade below that of brigadier general, and thereafter there shall be no promotions to any grade that would cause the number of officers authorized for such grade by section 1 of this act to be exceeded. Vacancies existing in any grade below brigadier general on the date of approval of this act and not actually filled by the acceptance of a tendered appointment shall not be filled: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent promotions in the Medical Department and of chaplains as now provided by law.

SEC. 3. That within five months of the date of approval of this act the number of officers shall be reduced to not to exceed the numbers prescribed in section 1 of this act and 194 additional majors, 395 additional captains, 32 additional officers of the Dental Corps, 40 additional officers of the Medical Administrative Corps, and 22 additional chaplains: Provided, That the number of first lieutenants may be reduced to such number as the President may deem advisable: Provided further, That additional officers within the numbers herein prescribed are authorized only during such time as may be necessary by retirement, discharge, and other means to absorb such additional officers and to reduce said grades and branches to the numbers prescribed in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War shall convene a board of five general officers, who, under regulations prescribed by him, shall select such number of officers, hereinafter designated as supernumerary officers, as may be necessary, in addition to officers removed from the active list by other means, to reduce to not to exceed the numbers to which reduction is to be made within five months of the date of the approval of this act as prescribed in the preceding section: Provided, That for the Medical Corps, the Dental Corps, the Veterinary Corps, and the chaplains the number in each branch in each grade above captain shall be reduced not less than the same per cent that the whole number of officers of such branch is required to be reduced within five months of the date of approval of this act.

SEC. 5. That within five months of the date of approval of this act the President may, in his discretion and upon application from the officer concerned, place officers upon the unlimited retired list or discharge officers under the same conditions as to length of service and pay as prescribed in the following section of this act for supernumerary officers: Provided, That no officer may be so retired or discharged whose retirement or discharge would reduce the number in any grade or branch below the number to which reduction is to be made within five months as prescribed in section 3 of this act: Provided further, That hereafter the President may, in his discretion, place upon the retired list any officer who, under existing law, may be retired on his own application.

SEC. 6. That supernumerary officers of more than 10 years' commissioned service shall within five months of the date of approval of this act, or as soon thereafter as practicable, be placed upon the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 3 per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of commissioned service, not exceeding 75 per cent. Supernumerary officers of not more than 10 years' commissioned service shall within five months of the date of approval of this act, or as soon thereafter as practicable, be honorably discharged with one year's pay, unless they shall have more than 7½ years' commissioned service, in which case they shall be discharged with two years' pay: Provided, That supernumerary officers of more than 10 years' commissioned service, who so elect, may be discharged with two years' pay in lieu of retirement and retired pay as herein provided.

In computing service under this section only service as a commissioned officer in the active service of the United States shall be counted: Provided, That any officer whose name is carried on the promotion list, who was originally appointed in a grade above second lieutenant, shall be credited with a length of service that shall be the same as that of the officer next above him on the promotion list who was originally appointed in the grade of second lieutenant prior to July 1, 1920; and any officer of the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Veterinary Corps, or any chaplain originally appointed in a grade above the lowest authorized for the branch in which commissioned shall be credited with a length of service that shall be the same as that of the officer of said branch next senior in rank who was originally appointed in such authorized lowest grade; and captains and first lieutenants of the Medical Administrative Corps shall be credited with 10 and 5 years' commissioned service, respectively, to which shall be added their actual service as commissioned officers since July 1, 1920; and any colonel, except of the Medical Department, whose name is not borne on the promotion list and who was originally appointed in a grade above second lieutenant shall be credited with the same service as the colonel, exclusive of colonels of the Medical Department, next senior in rank who was originally appointed in the grade of second lieutenant: Provided further, That any officer whose length of commissioned service is actually greater than that with which he would be credited under the foregoing proviso shall be credited with such actual length of commissioned service. Service shall be credited as prescribed in this section for the purposes of this act only.

SEC. 7. That hereafter there shall be no appointments in the Medical Department that will cause the number of officers of any branch thereof to exceed the number prescribed for such branch in section 1 of this act or that will cause the total number of officers of the Medical Department to exceed 1,455, exclusive of general officers now commissioned therein, and there shall be no appointments of chaplains that will cause the number of chaplains prescribed in section 1 of this act to be exceeded.

SEC. 8. That whenever the total number of officers of the Regular Army shall be less than the maximum number authorized by this act, the President may, in his discretion, order reserve officers to active duty with their consent within the limits of funds available appropriated for pay of officers of the Army, and within the vacancies existing in the Regular Army in the numbers authorized by section 1 of this act.

SEC. 9. That the officers provided by section 1 of this act shall be assigned to the several branches of the Army so that the number assigned to each branch, exclusive of the Medical Department and chaplains, shall be 84.2 per cent of the number prescribed for such branch by the act of June 4, 1920, but the President may increase or diminish the number of officers assigned to any branch by not more than a total of 35 per cent.

SEC. 10. That all laws and parts of laws, in so far as they are inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have asked for the privilege of using some of the valuable time of the committee, within which I hope to discuss as briefly as possible two provisions of this bill in which I am deeply interested and in which I think the country is interested. The first is that provision carrying an appropriation for the work on the rivers and harbors of the country and the second is the item providing for the continuation of the Mississippi-Warrior Barge Line service.

It is my understanding that General Dawes and his committee occupied the whole of 20 minutes in the original consideration of the item providing for river and harbor work in this bill, and even then without consulting the Army engineers. As a result of this 20 minutes' consideration and this "rough and ready" manner of estimating for one of the greatest and most important activities of the Government they recommended or suggested $13,000,000 for all the rivers and harbors of the Nation. Just think of it, gentlemen, this Budget committee, that is supposed to be saving so much money for the taxpayers of the country—and they are saving it on paper—using only 20 minutes in making an estimate which the Rivers and Harbors Committee, together with the engineers, usually make by hard work in the course of a week or 10 days. And yet I am told that some of the members of the Committee on Appropriations were ready to accept this estimate and put the thirteen-million item in this bill. This is the result of your change in the rules of this House whereby you have 35 Members of Congress passing upon the appropriations for all the expenditures of the Government. Here you have three men passing upon the amount necessary for river and harbor work, when neither of them have ever before made a study of such legislation and are unfamiliar with the country's needs along this line.

The friends of the river and harbor work suggested to the Budget committee that $13,000,000 would hardly provide for the maintenance of the channels, and after calling in the engineers and after the Subcommittee on Appropriations made some investigation the amount carried in this bill was agreed upon. How the committee ever agreed upon this amount of $27,635,000, and how they ever persuaded themselves, even in their wildest desire for economy, to believe that this sum is sufficient I have never been able to understand. I have seen men save a lot of money and make money with a piece of paper and a pencil, but when the actual operations began they were sorely disappointed. So it will be with these experts on river and harbor work, who believe this amount will accomplish results. Not only they will be disappointed but the country will be disappointed, and I venture to assert that you who are responsible for this legislation will hear from it in the coming elections if you do not amend this bill so as to carry the amount which the engineers show conclusively is absolutely necessary in order to properly, economically, and wisely maintain and improve our rivers and harbors. Why should the Appropriations Committee call to their assistance the office of the Chief of Engineers and then refuse to adopt the advice or suggestions given them by General Taylor, as shown in the hearings covering some 200 pages? In these hearings it is shown beyond question, just as it was shown to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, that $42,815,661 is the minimum amount with which the Engineer Department can properly function

The amount carried in this bill does not mean economy. I appreciate the fact that this is a time when every one of us should practice as well as preach economy. There is such a thing as stinting economy, an unwise economy, and a foolish economy which results in waste. If you persist or if this House persists in appropriating only the amount carried in this bill for the river and harbor work, you will actually waste the public moneys by such a niggardly and unsound policy. I say you will waste money, because this amount can not get us anywhere. We could properly maintain the important channels, but we could not accomplish anything in the way of completion of the new projects. I believe it would be economy in the long run to immediately make appropriations for the completion of all the projects already adopted.

We have in this country the greatest river systems on earth, but we are not developing and utilizing them to their capacity. We spend less money in proportion to our population and resources than any other nation. Even during the war, Germany expended more each year on her waterways than we carry in this bill. France has developed her waterways to a state of high efficiency. A noted Frenchman, viewing the Mississippi River at St. Louis a few years ago, exclaimed:

> If France had such a river flowing through her heart without being used to carry its commerce, it would go mad.

In 1908 James J. Hill, in addressing the Rivers and Harbors Congress, said:

> Our neighbor on the north has put us to shame. Canada has spent in proportion to her population and wealth dollars on her waterway systems where we have spent dimes. Because she has worked on an intelligent plan, she has more to show for her dime than we have to show for our dollar.

For the last two years this Congress has appropriated lump sums of twelve and fifteen millions of dollars, in round figures, for rivers and harbors. It is argued that there are some fifty millions now appropriated for the work and in the hands of the engineers. This is not correct, and while there have been available under continuing appropriations various amounts for specific projects, you must not forget that these amounts must be expended on the projects for which they were appropriated and can not be used on any other project. For instance, money that may be expended on the Ohio River for locks and dams can not be used at Mobile or Boston for their harbors.

According to the testimony before the committee there was of all moneys appropriated for all river and harbor improvement in the country, including, of course, money for specific projects, the sum of $28,324,247.89 in the hands of the engineers, unexpended on December 1, 1921. Of this amount $9,774,165.76 is now obligated on contract, leaving a balance of $18,550,082.13 unexpended and unobligated on last December 1. We have expended since that date about $2,500,000 per month. At this rate of expenditure you will see where we will be at the end of the year.

The testimony before the committee further shows that of all the money heretofore appropriated for all projects, every penny has now been allocated with the exception of $203,500. Remember this is the amount available unexpended and unallocated at present, under all the appropriations made. You will therefore see that we have come to the end of using the money heretofore provided, and the only money available for improvement of rivers and harbors for the next fiscal year is the amount you carry in this bill. This amount is totally inadequate, and the amount absolutely necessary is $42,815,661.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ROACH. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it is taking forty-two millions to carry on the work of the several projects that are now under way?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes; I mean to say that forty-two millions is the amount necessary and the amount which can be wisely and economically expended for the maintenance of completed projects and the improvement of projects already adopted by Congress but not completed. It takes something like twelve millions for maintenance alone. The engineers have to set aside about three millions for emergencies, which they have done under your lump-sum appropriations, and you will see that out of the twent-seven millions carried in this item we could not hope to accomplish anything in the way of new work on uncompleted projects.

Mr. ROACH. Then the item carried in this bill will not be sufficient to properly carry on the work of improving projects already adopted?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is quite true.

Mr. ROACH. Can the gentleman tell us what particular projects will suffer?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will say to the gentleman that all uncompleted projects will suffer, and those completed, I fear, will not be properly maintained. General Taylor says if we appropriate only the amount carried in this bill the engineers could only allocate about 50 per cent of the money needed on each project. We have, according to his testimony, something over 500 works or projects altogether, and at the present time work is being prosecuted on less than 100 of these projects. I will state further that I have in mind three of the big harbors of the country which have already suffered as a result of the policy adopted by the Congress in taking care of river and harbor improvement during the last two or three years. These harbors are Mobile, Providence, and Baltimore. My time is so limited I shall ask the gentleman to excuse me from further interruption. I wish I could secure more time.

At Mobile a 30-foot project was adopted in 1917, at which time we had a completed project of 27 feet. At this good hour the mean depth in our channel is hardly 27 feet, and while the engineers say the project is 20 per cent completed the fact remains that it has hardly been maintained, and many vessels calling at the port of Mobile actually plow 2 or 3 feet of mud. Mobile is the tenth port in the United States. It is nearer the Panama Canal than any other southern port of its size. It is nearer Chicago and St. Louis than any other Gulf port and has five trunk-line railroads connecting it with all parts of the country. The United States Steel Corporation has constructed one of the best shipbuilding plants in the country at Chickasaw, a few miles north of Mobile. The ships built by this company could not load to their dead-weight capacity and get out of the harbor, so they were compelled to leave the port and call at other ports to complete their cargoes. Mobile is the largest shipbuilding port south of Newport News in the United States. Thousands of tons of commerce have been denied the use of the port of Mobile because of the insufficient depth of the channel. The engineers recognize the importance of the port and are themselves anxious to complete the 30-foot project, but they can not do this much-needed work at Mobile nor in other ports because Congress does not provide the funds. Mobile has received her full share of the money provided, but the amount is too small to accomplish anything in the way of new work on the channel.

In the harbor of Providence, I understand, within the last few months some work is necessary for the removal of shoals which interfere with the commerce of the port, and yet there is no money available for that work. At Baltimore it is going to take a million dollars to do work left undone, because the engineers did not have sufficient money to carry it on. A large part of this money could have been saved had funds been available for this harbor within the last two years.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. HILL. The engineers recommended $350,000 for work on the channel at Baltimore and we did not get it, and Baltimore is spending $50,000,000 of its own money on its own harbor.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It is my understanding that Baltimore has mapped out a great program in the way of improving her harbor at her own expense, and the people of Baltimore are to be congratulated upon this progressive movement and upon their spirit of cooperation.

Gentlemen of the committee, the engineers of the War Department are highly intelligent and patriotic. I will pit the Army engineers of this country against the engineers of the world. They are not only good officers but splendid gentlemen. They have no desire to waste the funds of the Treasury and, in my judgment, are real economists.

The testimony before the committee shows that the district engineers, the men on the ground, estimated that they could profitably use for the various projects of the country about $63,000,000. When these estimates reached the office of the Chief of Engineers, using the words of General Taylor, they were "combed with a fine-toothed comb." Every estimate was revised and sent back to the district officer, with the instruction that they cut their estimates "to the bone." The estimates were returned to Washington, and after revision and further cut of some $21,000,000 the figures show that $42,815,661 is the amount we must have for the next fiscal year.

Is the majority party of this Congress willing to stagnate and cripple this great and important activity of the Government? Are you willing to see organizations abandoned and equipment deteriorated? Are you going to waste the people's money by a picayunish appropriation of this kind for the care of our rivers and harbors, over which was floated last year 369,000,000 tons of commerce, of the value of $20,000,000,000?

The equipment of the engineers has deteriorated in the last three years. They have not contracted for new equipment, nor have they urged appropriations for new equipment, for the very reason that labor and material have been excessively high. Equipment or the construction of equipment can be done now for almost 50 per cent of the cost of two years ago. Contracts for work on harbors can be secured now for one-half the amount asked by the contractors 18 months ago. There is much unemployment in the country, and in some places laborers will work for their food. Contractors will now accept work without the hope of profit but simply to keep their organizations intact. This is the time, therefore, to embark upon additional public works of all kinds throughout the country.

If you expect to carry on the work of improving the rivers and harbors of the country, if you do not contemplate disbanding the organizations you maintain for that purpose, you must adopt an amendment to this item raising the amount to $42,815,661. This is not "pork-barrel" legislation. Such an amendment is necessary; it would show good judgment and in the end mean economy for the country.

If the time permits I beg you to indulge me in taking up one more proposition. It was suggested by some one yesterday afternoon that we should not make further appropriations for the Mississippi-Warrior Barge Line. No one is more anxious than I am to get the Government out of all sorts of business. The Government is, however, committed to the development of transportation on our inland waterways. Section 500 of the transportation act reads as follows:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation, service, and facility in connection with the commerce of the United States and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

We should not abandon our support of the Mississippi-Warrior service until it has had a fair trial. I contend, and I think the figures will bear me out, that this service is to-day almost self-sustaining. In the year 1920 the service operated at a net loss of $1,181,622.01, while for the last year the net loss is only $235,375, showing that it has picked up during 1921 nearly a million dollars. The present loss is largely depreciation on the equipment, which is charged off at the rate of 5 per cent on the original cost of the steel boats and 10 per cent of the cost of the wooden structures. This amounts to nearly $400,000 annually, and this amount, of course, is charged up as loss in operation. You will observe, therefore, but for this unusual amount charged off for depreciation the service is practically self-sustaining. The Mississippi end of the service operated at a very substantial profit, but there was a loss sustained on the Warrior end of the line. The loss on the Warrior is due principally to the use of improper equipment, an inequitable division of the rates between the railroads and the barge line, and a failure to extend the zones within which the joint rail and water rate should be operative. A petition asking for this extension is now before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The greatest handicap under which this service is operating is a refusal of the railroads to fairly divide the rates. To give you an idea of what I mean, let me call your attention to one instance where 10,000 bags of coffee were shipped from New Orleans to Birmingham by way of Tuscaloosa. The rate was 43 cents per 100 pounds from New Orleans; that is, the joint rate as published in the tariff of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The barge line paid 5 cents a bag to transfer the coffee at New Orleans. There being no joint water-rail rate from New Orleans by way of Tuscaloosa to Birmingham, the railroads can take the local rate, which was 39 cents from Tuscaloosa to Birmingham. They took their 39 cents for hauling this coffee the distance of 56 miles, and as a result the barge line actually paid 1 cent per 100 pounds for the privilege of carrying the coffee from New Orleans to Tuscaloosa. Steel is shipped down the Warrior River from Birmingham to Mobile, and there is a joint river and rail rate of $2.17 a ton. A railroad carries the steel 14.3 miles and receives 89 cents a ton, while the barge line pays the transfer cost and gets less for carrying the steel 407 miles than the railroads do for carrying it 14.3 miles. A petition to remedy these conditions was filed in October, 1920, but thus far no decision has been made by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. The hearings show that the delay in rendering a decision on the petition is due to the attorney for the company and the other side asking that it be postponed. No fault lies with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I can not say the gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can give the gentleman the page of the hearing. That is the testimony of Commissioner Esch.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I understood that there were requests for postponement, but even if that be true it occurs to me that the Interstate Commerce Commission could have remedied and should have remedied the situation some time ago.

The people of this country are entitled to the benefits of transportation on inland waterways, these great God-given resources of the Nation. I have no desire to cripple the orderly and proper function of our wonderful railway systems. What we need is the proper cooperation between the water and rail service. It is natural for the railroads of the country to oppose competition by the waterways, and they have always been hostile to the development of commerce on our inland rivers. Until we can pass some act or get some ruling that will prevent the railroads from choking and stifling to death the water transportation in this country we will never derive the full benefits of our great river system, on which this Government has expended its millions. [Applause.]

In the year 1920 commerce carried on the inland waterways connected with the canals of this country was 162,975,781 tons, valued at about $2,900,000,000. The learned gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], who for many years was a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and who is thoroughly familiar with the water transportation of the country, stated to me that last year the inland rivers alone, without the connecting canals, carried 80,000,000 tons of freight; that it would require 1,600,000 fifty-ton box cars, carrying 100,000 pounds each, to haul that freight; that if we estimate one train to carry 30 of these box cars, it would take 53,330 trains to haul it. The commerce floated on the rivers of the Mississippi Valley alone last year amounted to more than 50,000,000 tons of American freight. When we consider the handicaps under which commerce on our rivers is handled we can readily appreciate the vast possibilities of river transportation and the importance of its development.

It was suggested by some one on yesterday that there was no commerce on the Warrior end of the Mississippi-Warrior system. The report of the War Department for 1920 shows that 600,000 tons, valued at $11,000,000, passed over the Warrior River, and I understand there was an increase for the year 1921. The Warrior River taps the rich coal and iron fields of Alabama, where we are mining annually 20,000,000 tons of coal and have hardly scratched the surface. It is estimated that there are 16,000,000,000 tons of iron ore in the mineral district of Alabama, the very heart of which is reached by this river system.

I quote from the Mobile Register, a daily newspaper, in a recent issue, as follows:

> Steamer Havre Maru, a Japanese vessel, left the port of Mobile yesterday with 3,137 tons of Ensley steel rails for Japan. She headed for Galveston for additional cargo before leaving for the Orient. Shipment of rails from Ensley mills for the Orient has been continuous for a year out of the port of Mobile. The rails are floated down the Warrior in barges and constitute an important item in the southbound operations of that service.

I mention this to show you the possibilities of the Warrior River end of the barge line. There is no doubt in my mind that with the proper equipment and a fair division of rates the development of commerce on this river system will justify every dollar the Government has expended to prove that it is feasible.

Another great handicap to the Mississippi-Warrior service is the cost of the interchange of freight at Violet, which is the entrance from the Mississippi River to the Lake Borgne Canal for boat lines going from Mobile to New Orleans. The Mississippi River boats are too large to go through the lock and the Warrior River boats can not come through the lock to deliver their goods to New Orleans. This has cost the service about $20,000 a month, or $240,000 annually, and this expense will be eliminated by October 1, when it is expected that the industrial canal being constructed by the State of Louisiana, connecting the Mississippi River with Lake Pontchartrain, will be completed.

The Government has expended some $10,000,000 in connecting the port of Mobile with the coal fields of Alabama by an 8-foot channel through the Tombigbee and Warrior Rivers. The tonnage is there, and it would be the height of folly for Congress to abandon its policy of demonstrating the feasibility and value of this system as a great commercial highway. In my judgment, if you will give to this service $300,000, the amount recommended by the Secretary of War to be included in this bill, Congress will never be called upon again to appropriate one dollar for the cost of operation on the Mississippi-Warrior Barge Line. This amount may never be used by the service, but it should be carried as an emergency fund. While the service is practically self-sustaining now, a serious accident might create a deficit. It is simply to safeguard and assure the continued operation of the service that this amount is asked for.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the two gentlemen who have preceded me that in our enthusiasm for economy we may practice an economy that does not economize. I had an old political friend some years ago who used to tell a story about an old lady who mixed sawdust in her wheat bran for chicken feed. She said that when a setting of 14 eggs hatched out 13 of them hatched chickens with wooden legs and the fourteenth one hatched a woodpecker. [Laughter.] So the old lady discovered too late that she had been practicing an economy that did not economize. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as has been well said, we are now on the line of legislation in which we can and must cut appropriations and expenses in proportions sufficient to really mean something to the taxpayer—the matter of war and war preparedness, of naval armament and Military Establishment.

Practically every nation of the world owes its present financial embarrassment and heavy taxation to war in some form. And, to my mind, the most encouraging sign of the times is that the civilized nations are at last waking up to the fact that the prevention of war is an absolute necessity. It is either that or national bankruptcy. We have come upon a time when war is so costly that it means financial ruin even to the victor. Rome became satiated with wealth by the imposition of indemnities on the peoples of whom she made conquest. But any nation that tries to follow Rome's example now is doomed to disappointment. For we are learning that it is not now possible, even when nations have all justice on their side, to impose indemnity on a vanquished foe sufficient to pay so much as the original cost of war.

But a still worse feature of war is that the prewar and postwar cost is far greater than the immediate cost. Take two illustrations: In the War between the States the Federal Government spent about $800,000,000 in revenue and accumulated a debt of about three thousand million, a total expense of about $3,800,000,000. Since the war closed we have spent about twice the accumulated debt above mentioned in pensions, or six thousand million. And we still have on the pension rolls nearly a half million Civil War pensioners, who are receiving an average of $477.74 per person per year, or a total of nearly a quarter of a billion dollars. In other words, the Civil War is costing us in actual expenditure of revenue for pensions in 1922, 57 years after its close, as much or more than it cost in actual expenditure of revenue during one of the years through which it was fought.

Add to this all the cost of soldiers' homes and hospitals, all the cost of reconstruction to the Government, all that has been added to the cost of administration of government by conditions growing out of the war; then add the industrial and commercial loss from the disturbance of conditions and relations, and the diminution of man power through the death or disabling of a million men. This for the Federal Government.

Add to that all the cost and losses to the South, all the pensions that have been given to Confederate soldiers, all the terrible economic paralysis—and obviously the cost of the War between the States had not well begun when Lee surrendered at Appomattox. Again, take our participation in the late World War. Exclusive of the $10,000,000,000 which we loaned to our allies, we spent in conducting the war $22,000,000,000. Thus our total disbursement was $32,000,000,000. Since the war we have appropriated for soldier benefits of all kinds $1,462,845,000. This includes appropriations for gratuity, insurance, rehabilitation, hospitalization, compensation, and pensions. Calculating that 4,000,000 men entered the service this means an expenditure for soldier benefit alone in these three years of peace of nearly $366 dollars for every man that put on the uniform. It also means a cost of about $13.50 for every man, woman, and child in the United States, or $67.50 for every family in the United States. And this is only the beginning. Judging by the history of past wars the cost will increase from year to year as more of the soldiers die and leave widows and orphans and as all grow older and many fall into ill health. The peak of pension costs for the War between the States was not reached until 1921, 56 years after the war closed, and for that matter may not have been reached yet. Now, in addition to this comes the bonus, which looks to be practically assured, since the party in power is pledged to it and a large proportion of the minority favor it. Nobody seems to be able to give any certain estimate of its cost. The chairman of the committee, I believe, estimates the actual expenditure for the bonus as somewhat more than $4,000,000,000. Others estimate it at about $6,000,000,000.

But bring it to the lowest possible figure and it is hardly possible that the bonus will do less than double the cost of current soldier benefits for the next three years, or for that matter for many years. If this bonus could be collected from the heartless profiteers who coined their millions out of the blood of a bleeding world, our soldier boys would want it and justly. But 85 per cent of our people have an annual income of less than $350, and if the money is to come from a burdensome tax upon them I think the majority of our brave boys who went to the front will not want the bonus until the basis can be changed some way. So long as the present administration is controlled by a cabinet of millionaires, a situation unprecedented in the history of the country, and by a legislative majority that will so twist a tax bill as to make it possible for the same corporation by increasing its percentage income on its capitalization to decrease its taxes, I see little hope for that. Any provision made by this majority, gentlemen, and approved by this administration, for raising a bonus fund is going, I fear, to fall full weight on the poor people of the country. But I think we may also depend on it that this majority and this administration have arranged to so bungle and confuse the whole measure as to nullify any practical good that may come to the soldier boys and at the same time make a cheap bid for their votes—which bid will not be successful.

But again, this World War has left us with a national debt of $224.85 per capita, of $1,224.05 per family, and an annual interest charge of $8.05 per capita, or $43.25 per family.

Add this to the calculation of soldier-benefit cost just given and then add to this the local taxes under which our people generally are struggling, street and road tax, drainage or irrigation tax, school tax, State tax, county tax, municipal tax. Then face next the fact of millions of unemployed and the fact that farm products over a large part of the country have not for the past year brought actual cost of production and that many good people have been unable to borrow money to pay their local taxes. I know men who have heretofore been considered successful above the average and who on farms of hundreds of acres have not made money to pay their taxes. I know one county where at the end of the tax-paying period this winter it was reported that one-fourth of the taxpayers were delinquent.

Visualize this whole situation. Face it square; and if it does not startle you with ghosts of private and public bankruptcy, then I hope it will do the better thing of startling us all into a more serious view of our responsibilities in directing public affairs and of the importance of thrift and economy in private and public matters.

But back a little closer to my subject. We are on a bill making appropriations for the War Department, and I started out with the proposition that here is where we should make our effective strokes of economy. I have shown something of what war is costing us already.

England and France are in worse shape than we are. England's debt is $814.08 per capita, or $4,070.40 per family, three and a half times as big as ours per capita. France's debt is $1,218.10 per capita, or $6,090.50 per family, or more than five times as big as ours. Yet England has spent since the war on her naval and military establishments, including air, which she carries separately, about $2,000,000,000. And France last year, not since the war, but two years after the war, spent one and three quarter billions.

America since the war has spent $2,000,000,000 on ships soon to be scrapped, and perhaps more than that on Army and Navy expenses that might have been saved had we begun two years ago the disarmament program that was then before us.

Had we saved this and paid it on our debt, and had France and England saved theirs and paid it to us on their debt, as they might have done with a little cooperation from us, we would to-day have been five and a half billion dollars better off, $10 taxation off of every person and $50 off of every family, with even greater promise of relief in the future.

But France and England can not be induced to disarm while we continue to arm, and we can not blame them. We must allow them the same degree of liberty in such things that we ourselves assume.

America is in position to lead the disarmament of the world as no other nation has ever been, and it is to our own interest as well as to the good of the world that we do so. We have begun late, but we have begun well. Let us continue as we have begun. For my part I am gravitating far toward Mr. McAdoo's position on the Navy question. If no nation had any real navy, we would all be equal and the prospect of war would be largely diminished and the cause of arbitration largely advanced.

And why should America now keep anything like a really fighting land force? We need a police force, but certainly nothing more. On the scale of modern wars, it would mean worse than war for any nation to maintain anything like an adequate war army in peace times. And as for keeping a full force of officers with a skeleton army for nucleus and training in case of war, first, let us avoid the "case of war"; and second, let us remember that we have not less than 3,000,000 trained men now, trained in actual war, the most effective military training possible, which is all the army we are likely to need for years.

For my part, I am more than ready to cut the Army to a hundred thousand. For the present, and let us hope for the future, we would be taking no serious risk to cut it considerably lower than that.

Congress has almost unlimited taxing power and appropriating power, and it is easy for us to sit here and draw our salaries and vote taxes and appropriations, but under present world conditions and domestic conditions it is criminal oppression for us to do so except in response to demands that are absolute and compelling.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that he has not that much time remaining.

Mr. SISSON. I think I have 15 minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. SISSON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 17 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. I may not use all the time yielded to me, but I appreciate the courtesy of the gentlemen in extending it to me.

Mr. Chairman, it has occurred to me that it is a right thing for some one to do—I wish it had fallen into better hands—to speak for the independence of the House and the right of Congress to legislate without undue interference. I think I may safely say we will always welcome the advice of the President of the United States at any time; and however we may differ or have differed either with the President or with any of his predecessors, it is his right under the Constitution to give us the benefit of his advice. But things have gone so far that not only Cabinet officers but clerks under them—with impressive titles—feel it is incumbent upon them to tell Congress what we should do. The very influential, powerful press of the country gives ear to those in high places, and their remarks and their judgment pass current throughout the country, and very little comes from Congress itself except the decisions made here.

For illustration, the Secretary of the Treasury, who is unquestionably an able man, wrote a letter of 24 pages in regard to the bonus bill, which bill I wish to discuss briefly.

No member of the committee ever asked him to write the letter. It was given to the press immediately after he wrote it and circulated throughout the country. It was a letter practically in condemnation of the action of the Ways and Means Committee, and also incidentally of the prevailing sentiment of the House and of those who approved of what is known as the soldiers' bonus bill.

Another gentleman, Mr. Crissinger, gave to the press of the country his particular advice, and it was in the nature of a refusal on his part to recognize legislation from Congress, because he gave his judgment of what the national banks, over which he had jurisdiction, should do.

A gentleman out in Kansas has written a very comprehensive statement in three lines, handed to me a few moments ago by Representative STRONG of Kansas. It comes from a former president of the Bankers' Association of Kansas. I believe he expresses the sentiment of the country outside of a few big business centers. He says:

MY DEAR MR. STRONG: The inclosed clipping causes a man to wonder whether employees of this Government or Congress are running our United States affairs.

He is a banker, and he refers to the Crissinger statement that he would advise banks not to loan money on the soldiers' bonus certificates.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I want to call attention to the fact that there is one banker in my district—and he is typical of others—who says he is willing to cash the certificates of the boys if they are granted under the bonus bill.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman from Kansas. I am satisfied there are thousands of banks in the country that will do the same.

The point I want to make at this time is that Congress is being condemned for endeavoring to give ex-soldiers some slight help, as is proposed by the bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee. And let me say, Mr. Chairman, that every member of our committee, from the chairman [Mr. FORDNEY] down to members who are opposed to the bill, have given the best service they could and have worked hard in season and out for two months in preparation of the bill reported.

It is not what we all want. Like all legislation, it is a matter largely of compromise, but we feel it is a good bill and will give aid to the soldier, and that is what we have endeavored to present to the House. I am not speaking for the committee, but I am saying this because the soldier is entitled to the information and to have unjust criticisms answered on the floor of the House. We have had recent condemnation of the bill on this floor. Members have attacked the bill without knowledge of its provisions. Crissinger did not know what it contained. That is one cause for his criticism given to the papers. Suggestion has been made that we have paid little attention to the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury and other men of standing, which is not true. We have long studied and changed the bill; we have studied the evidence of all parties carefully and we believe we know how the bill is going to affect the country just as well as the Secretary, and we are endeavoring to do our duties as Members of Congress responsible to the country.

SOLDIERS' BONUS BILL.

Great financial interests and powerful newspapers have bitterly opposed the soldiers' bonus bill by misrepresentation and unjust criticism. These are the same influences that demanded Congress take the men and boys from their jobs and send them to do our fighting. The bill is now before the House.

For many weeks Chairman FORDNEY and our committee have labored in an effort to prevent any heavy drain on the Treasury and yet to do some measure of justice to the ex-service men of the country. After public hearings to determine the merits of the latest objections of Secretary Mellon and Crissinger we reported the bill favorably by a vote of 19 to 5, or nearly 4 to 1, and defeated Mr. Mellon's sales-tax proposal by the same record vote.

The soldiers' bonus bill is based on length of service in the American Army or Navy with small increase for overseas service. It is confined to enlisted men and to officers not above rank of captain in the Army. As reported by our committee, the bill provides, first, that the veteran of the last war may have either (1) adjusted service pay in cash from the Government if his service credit does not exceed $50; (2) an adjusted service certificate based on his service of $1 per day in this country and $1.25 overseas, not to exceed in all $500 and $625, respectively, plus 25 per cent of the certificate's face value and interest compounded annually for 20 years at 4½ per cent, the $60 heretofore paid by the Government to be deducted; (3) vocational training with service-pay allowance of $1.75 per day; (4) farm or home aid; and (5) land settlement on irrigated projects.

The service certificates will have a loan value of 50 per cent of their face for three years that may be borrowed from any bank or trust company at interest rates not exceeding 2 per cent over Federal reserve bank rates, or at a maximum of about 7 per cent. If canceled or unpaid during the three years, a balance is credited to the soldier. Thereafter the Government will loan 80 per cent of the face of the certificate. If carried 20 years without any loan, the certificates through compounding of interest will have a cash value of about three times the base rate. The bill seeks to have the ex-service man retain his certificate as paid-up insurance and to make more attractive the opportunity of saving. If one-half of the men make loans, and at the full 50 per cent it would amount to less than $350,000,000 draft on all the banks and trust companies of the country, or less than 1 per cent of their assets, and this amount is probably far more than will be drawn from the banks. Practically all of the money so drawn will find its way back to the banks within 30 days. With total bank assets reported of about forty billions of dollars it shows the character and purpose of Treasury contentions that predict disaster will occur if less than 1 per cent additional is offered, not necessarily accepted, to member banks.

This briefly describes the options contained in the bill. Exaggerated statements of probable cost of loans by banks and other propaganda have been spread broadcast in order to arouse opposition to the bill, but estimates may be made with some degree of certainty based on known facts.

NUMBER ENTITLED TO BONUS AND AMOUNT.

Army and Navy witnesses testify that the total number of persons entitled under the bill is 4,458,199. Based on days of service the amount is computed:

Overseas $1.25 class—
Day base	$659,469,956	Cash base	$824,333,820
Not overseas $1 class—
Day base	831,441,804	Cash base	831,441,804
Total, day base	1,490,910,860	Cash base	1,655,775,624
Deduct balance to $50 men			160,775,624
Net cash base			1,495,000,000
Increase of 25 per cent			375,750,000
Gross cash base			1,868,750,000
If compounded 20 years			4,506,890,000

That estimate gives the Government the use of the cash base for 20 years without charge, while the outside Treasury cash charge is $1,868,000,000, or less than the cost of the war for a month and a half during 1918. The loan value at the outset is only the net cash base, and it will require several months to prepare the options after the bill becomes law. No unprejudiced man will find serious objection to this plan without offering something preferable, and such offer singularly enough has been lacking from the Treasury Department.

These are outside figures and will be varied by the different options, but estimates of actual payments made by the Government under this bill during the next 20 years at the outside averages about $225,000,000 annually, which includes compounding of interest.

Under the bill the cash drain on the Treasury will be comparatively small until the Government-loan period of three years is reached and any interest thereafter is repaid at 4½ per cent by the borrower, so that no new charge will be made from that source. Foreign debts should finance the bonus.

COMPTROLLER CRISSINGER WARNS CONGRESS.

Congress is warned by the press daily, weekly, and monthly just what Secretary of the Treasury Mellon and Comptroller Crissinger and other officials of the administration think of Congress and of the soldiers' bonus bill. It is a novel proposition when Crissinger says that he will not permit national banks of the country to loan to the soldiers on their certificates if the bill is passed by Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In the statements I have seen from Mr. Crissinger he did not say he would not permit. He said he would advise the banks not, but I did not understand at any time he used the expression that he would not permit the banks to loan.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman's statement is right, but I take it when a school teacher in school or the man in charge of all national banks of the country says he would not advise the banks to do a certain thing, he means "permit."

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will permit, is it not fair to state that that is not exactly what Mr. Crissinger says. I understand he said that he would advise if he was asked to advise. He did not say he would advise.

Mr. FREAR. I am speaking of the article he gave to the press, not of his statement made before the committee.

Mr. SNYDER. I think he stated——

Mr. FREAR. In the statement before the committee he modified his position.

Mr. SNYDER. I do not think he modified it at all. I think he said to the committee that if he was asked to advise that he would advise them not to do it.

Mr. FREAR. It has been published repeatedly that he was opposed to this proposition and that he was going to advise banks not to loan money to soldiers on their certificates.

Thousands of other banks will do so if our advices are right, but on what meat does Crissinger feed, and for whom does he speak? Is Crissinger or Congress to determine what the bill contains? Crissinger and Secretary Mellon claim that when the soldiers ask for loans they will find they have "frozen credits."

The freezing process that confronts the soldiers and Congress to-day is that which comes from officials of the Treasury Department who have handed out many icicles to Congress and to the soldiers recently. Frequent threats are reported that campaign contributions will not be forthcoming unless a sales tax is passed as a substitute for the present personal income tax.

Again it is said the price of a soldiers' bonus bill must be a general consumption tax to relieve large taxpayers.

The Wall Street campaign of scaring the administration and the country is found on every hand. A New York newspaper opposed to the soldier bonus says in a staring headline over a news dispatch from Washington: "Bonus alienating donors to G. O. P. campaign coffer—Prominent supporters emphasize displeasure in reply to national committee appeal."

The latest expression of Secretary Mellon, of 24 pages, received yesterday and published broadcast over the country, contains one palpable mistake of over $165,000,000,000—a mere bagatelle. Other efforts to unfairly prejudice the bill in public opinion appear throughout the entire letter.

From now on distorted statements of Treasury receipts and conditions may be expected, all of which were lacking when the railway securities bill was before the House.

As an evidence of frigidity, why did the Treasury first demand that obnoxious taxes be placed in the bonus bill, which we were later informed would have invited its veto? Why did the Treasury Department next refuse Congress a soldiers' bonus bill unless it provided its own means of payment?

The Secretary of the Treasury suggested a sales tax and various other taxes, and we were told that any bill that did not contain those proposals would be vetoed.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for just one question? I do not think the department recommended the sales tax. Secretary Mellon has never recommended a sales tax in my presence.

Mr. FREAR. The other day when I questioned the Secretary I asked, "You are opposed to the reenactment of the excise-profits tax?" He answered, "Yes." "You are opposed to the issuance of the foreign bonds as security?" His answer was "Yes, sir." I asked about the inheritance tax, gift tax, and other taxes, and finally I said: "The only alternative, then, is a sales tax, Mr. Secretary?" And he said, "Yes; a kind of sales tax." I believe I state the record substantially.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I was not present.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Not now; I will later if I have time.

Why did the department object to paying any soldiers' bonus from Treasury certificates when it had previously paid billions of dollars in canceled war contracts? Why did the department reject any proposal to pay the soldiers' bonus bill by $11,000,000,000 in foreign debts?

Why did the department admit it will take 2,000 more employees, who could not be housed, to administer a sales tax and yet left that tax as the only alternative; a tax that helped overturn the Canadian Parliament last December, a tax never before levied in this country in time of peace?

The American people may well ask, Why should Congress abandon its right and duty to legislate for the whole people independent of Mr. Mellon's department or any other branch of Government?

Why is the sales tax constantly linked up with the soldiers' bonus bill when no general sales tax could pass Congress unless fastened onto some worthy object? Why are the soldiers asked to help pay their own bonus through a sales tax, and what special reason has Wall Street and big business generally for demanding a general sales tax?

THE REASON FOR A SALES TAX.

The following table explains why every man who pays a large income tax favors a sales tax that will relieve him from his income taxes. Any sales tax once adopted will not be repealed, but will be constantly enlarged in its scope by interests that never sleep. That is Canada's experience. This table explains the reason:

Present income-tax payments.

Income.	Normal tax.	Surtax 1921 act.	Total tax.
$6,000	$160	.....	$160
$10,000	480	$40	520
$20,000	1,280	440	1,720
$25,000	1,600	780	2,380
$30,000	2,080	1,440	3,520
$50,000	3,680	4,960	8,640
$75,000	5,600	11,800	17,400
$100,000	7,680	22,460	30,140
$200,000	15,680	70,960	86,640
$500,000	30,680	220,960	260,640
$1,000,000	79,680	470,960	550,640

I do not claim these rates are just, but do claim that an eventual $1,000,000,000 sales tax is indefensible. The man who pays $8,640 tax on a $50,000 income has a vital interest in a sales tax. The man who pays $550,640 on a $1,000,000 income has a vital interest in a sales tax.

A few newspaper publishers and many other men, including at least one department head are to-day paying upward of $550,640 annual income tax that will be wiped out if the tax burden can be shifted from their pocketbooks to the shoulders of the hundred million through a consumption tax on what the people eat, wear, and use.

I desire to have those persons who are interested in the sales tax study the little table at this point. A man who has $2,000,000 income pays $1,000,000 tax to-day, ordinarily speaking, on his income. If he has $1,000,000 income he pays $550,000 income tax. And in a letter which I sent to the Secretary of the Treasury the other day, in response to a long letter from him which I felt unfairly stated the position of the committee, men who are publishers of great newspapers, like publishers in the city of Washington, for instance, with possibly a million or two million dollars income or more, have an interest of over half of that income in securing the repeal of the income tax and the enactment of a sales tax, which several witnesses who have been before our committee have urged as a substitute for the income tax. Naturally a man does not want to pay taxes. I am not criticizing anyone for that human trait. The only question which we have to decide here is which is the proper tax for the country, in our judgment. And that I have tried to press upon the House repeatedly, and possibly with reiteration, but we ought to know its effect.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Later on, but not now.

It would seem a just method of financing the bonus bill, based on the theory of ability to pay, would be to reenact the excess-profits tax, which will return about $460,000,000 for 1921. If any new tax is levied this tax should be reenacted. However, this plan does not meet with unanimous favor, and a popular plan is open that will not require the levy of any new tax.

We are advised by reputable writers in the Washington Post, Star, and Times that the President will veto any bonus bill without a sales tax. Price, of the Post, Lawrence, of the Star, and various writers for the Times are sending these articles throughout the country.

Lawrence says, March 11:

> The President is in favor of the sales tax for many reasons: He believes it will collect the money for the bonus easily, and he thinks it may get a trial sufficient to prove to the country that a sales tax would be a good substitute for most forms of taxation.

I do not believe that Lawrence knows the President's mind. It is also significant that the publishers of two of the papers named and the Secretary of the Treasury are reputed to pay annually over a million dollars each in income taxes that would be wiped out if a shift could be made through a sales tax to the backs of the people. That shift has been rejected by the Republican platform, which specifically declared the party would not excessively mulct the consumer. Price, Lawrence, and others presumably represent only the sentiment of publishers that have great interests at stake.

PAST EFFORTS TO PASS A SALES TAX.

The press and high officials, as stated, have declared that no bonus bill shall be allowed unless accompanied by a tax, and no tax will be acceptable except a consumption tax. Bankers, brokers, publishers, manufacturers, and large business interests generally that desired to escape the excess-profits tax and the present income tax have demanded the repeal of both. The excess-profits tax was repealed and high surtaxes reduced. A consumption tax was next proposed, but defeated on the first bonus bill that passed the House. Again it was defeated when tacked to the revenue bill. Its insistence now in this bill is postponed only by confident claims it will be put on in the Senate. Linked with the bonus bill it is proposed as a permanent part of our revenue system to replace the income tax. Levied on what we eat, wear, and use, opposed by every disinterested tax expert in the country, by every farm organization and by organized labor, we are yet told it will be fastened on the American people at some stage of this soldiers' bonus legislation and that soldiers will be compelled to help pay their own bonus. Idle men and women of the country will pay if they consume; that is the penalty proposed to be exacted for asking a bonus for the soldier. Will these interests be able to defeat the bonus bill if it fails to carry a vicious sales tax?

HOW THE BONUS BILL SHOULD BE PAID.

We spent over $1,000,000,000 monthly for war. We loaned allied Governments money which, with interest, now amounts to $11,000,000,000. If our soldiers had not won the war, that debt would have been wiped out. Even now many of those who oppose the bonus ask that foreign debts be canceled to "help business." Secretary Mellon says that 80 per cent of the $11,000,000,000 should be collected, eventually. Of that amount England owes four and one-half billions of dollars, and her interest alone that will be paid us will average about $200,000,000 annually; or, in other words, the English interest alone will practically wipe out the soldiers' bonus bill in 20 years without touching the principal. What better means could be asked for financing the soldiers' bonus bill than by using a small part of the foreign debts which were made secure by the sacrifices of American soldiers?

In to-day's Herald a column article quotes Otto Kahn, a New York banker and German ex-soldier, according to Who's Who, urging the cancellation of debts of foreign Governments held by this country to help business—debts amounting to $11,000,000,000. And yet he is opposed to the bonus, and he is the man who led all others before our committee in favor of the sales tax. Read his speech in to-day's papers. It is echoed by other international bankers of New York City, whom I quoted at length when the refunding bill was before the House.

The English loan is about $4,500,000,000. The annual interest on that is about $200,000,000. It will be more than sufficient, compounded, to pay all the soldiers' bonus.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, we ought not to deceive ourselves about that matter. If the interest collected from the foreign Governments was taken and paid on that it would be simply a diversion. We would have to pay the interest on the bonds.

Mr. FREAR. Undoubtedly. I am simply calling attention to the fact that many men to-day are urging cancellation of the $11,000,000,000 debt to help business, and they are against a soldiers' bonus. I believe we can divert interest on this loan, made safe by the sacrifices of American soldiers, and can divert into no more worthy channel than this bonus bill.

OTHER COUNTRIES AND OUR OWN STATES.

We are behind all our allies in recognition of ex-soldiers. The following maximum payments have been made by other Governments to their enlisted men: Canada, $631; Belgium, $492; France, $249; England, $190; Italy, $64. Most of these Governments have debts that reach upward of one-half or more of their national wealth. Ours, the richest Government in the world, with national wealth of over $250,000,000,000, has a total indebtedness of less than $24,000,000,000. Against this debt 80 per cent of $11,000,000,000 foreign debt may be set off, leaving a net debt of approximately $16,000,000,000, or about 6½ per cent of our national wealth, and yet the richest country in the world, with the smallest per capita debt and only a fraction of that of England, is behind all others in recognition of its soldiers. Have our own people favored soldiers' bonus legislation?

Twenty-four States—just half the total—have made some cash provision for their soldiers and 18 States have given majorities and in some cases overwhelming referendums in favor of such legislation. With three exceptions, every State in the Union has given State aid to its service men. New York gave $45,000,000 to its service men, but the gift was set aside by legal proceedings. The strongest opposition to the bonus comes from that State.

Yesterday the assembly of the State of New York unanimously passed a constitutional amendment for $45,000,000, to be covered by bonds, and yet most of the pressure comes from the city of New York against this bonus bill. That measure passed the New York Assembly unanimously.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman means that the motion was that it should go to the people to be voted on.

Mr. FREAR. And the people, as they did before, will pass it overwhelmingly. The people in Wall Street will not.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, the gentleman knows that.

Mr. FREAR. Unquestionably, if the Wall Street Journal, Times, and other papers correctly represent the sentiment of that locality. Complaint is made that its taxes are heavy, but a great part of the national wealth is centered in New York City and the taxes are not nearly as heavy proportionately as the tax paid by farmers and labor generally of the country, a majority of whom received less than $500 per laborer, annually, according to the Anderson report and other official statistics. Many of the ex-service men are among this number.

BONUS CRITICS.

The Wall Street Journal has been aptly described as the leader that sounds the opposition keynote to any soldiers' bonus bill. A few metropolitan papers in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and elsewhere, read by brokers, big bankers, and professionals of the stock and bond and banking business, describe Congress as raiding the Nation's Treasury. For illustration we read from the Journal: "There is no way of passing a soldiers' bonus, and if there were a way the bonus should not be paid." * * * "It prostitutes patriotic service," and so forth.

After vehement denunciation of Congress and of ex-service bonus claims the Wall Street Journal sounds a different tone when it says on February 18: "The railways are short not less than $350,000,000 of compensation, both morally and legally due them," and again "the money used to subsidize shipping would be in the nature of national defense." These papers constantly lampoon and misrepresent Congress speaking for those who with little knowledge and less understanding of the subject continually shower on Members propaganda against any bonus egislation.

The power of propaganda voiced by New York financiers, by the Journal, and other metropolitan papers is well understood. For months before we entered the war these agencies bombarded Congress with demands that we declare war immediately. We were constantly reminded of the insecurity of New York City, where the world's financiers were centered. Its people were said to be in mortal terror of enemy submarines and hostile airplanes. Possession of $5,000,000,000 of allied indebtedness by New York money interests it was known would be valueless if the Allies were defeated, and these interests further feared German indemnities unless we entered the war.

Belgium's invasion, sinking of the Lusitania, war against Prussianism, self-determination of small nations were additional reasons advanced for immediate declaration of war, while conscription of all able-bodied men from the Atlantic to the Pacific was demanded for protection of American rights, including the great financial interests centered at New York.

TWO PICTURES.

War was declared and those who thereby enormously profited were among the hundreds of multimillionaires in New York and elsewhere whose numbers were doubled during three years of war. While our soldiers were serving in camp or at the front for a dollar a day, men of wealth continually waxed more numerous and powerful at home until American soldiers in France had won the war and forced the armistice.

To-day all the pictures of our soldier boys marching to their transports and all the sacrifices of war are forgotten by these New York financiers, many of whom advocate the cancellation of $11,000,000,000 of European debts, which would vastly enhance the value of five billions of allied private obligations they now hold. These same financiers, with few exceptions, strongly oppose any soldiers' bonus to be paid by allied bonds, because that would block foreign debt cancellation plans. The journals they control bitterly denounce Congress as cowardly and acting through fear of political consequences because it now favors a bonus and because it would grant tardy recognition heretofore extended by every other country to its ex-service men.

These financiers and big business men, who urged the war and profiteered by the war, now demand that a general consumption tax be plastered over the consumers of the country as a penalty tax for any soldiers' bonus. These same men, who demand the cancellation of foreign bonds, who demand a sales tax, who denounce Congress for political motives—these are the men who demanded immediate war, to protect their billions of allied securities, and asked for the conscription of young manhood of the country, which was invoked for the first time in all our history. Now they threaten Congress, individually and collectively, for questioning Wall Street's commands.

Multimillionaires made great fortunes during a few years of war, which were saved from German indemnity by the sacrifices of American doughboys. Now they shout threats because Congress is giving these same doughboys only about what one month of war cost this country. Many months of war were saved to the country and to the world by these boys, and yet these same financiers and big business men have forgotten the days of 1918—although the people have longer memories.

BILLS NOT OPPOSED.

What of recent demands on Congress by New York financiers for guaranty of their railway security earnings and what of the bill for $500,000,000 that passed the House to help stabilize railway securities?

What of successful demands on Congress by these financiers for $3,000,000,000 with which to pay canceled war contracts financed by the same interests? Not one objector was then found among the army of Wall Street financiers or the journals they control. We were not asked to find what profiteers or cost-plus war contractors were financially wounded, maimed, or otherwise disabled. All were financial patriots and all were treated alike, but to-day, when Congress proposes to pay the ex-service men $1 a day for saving Wall Street and the country from possible German indemnity, the financial interests thus saved ask why should we reward patriotism unless physically crippled, and insist that any bonus must be paid by the soldiers and the hundred million of people through a consumption tax, by those who have little margin over what they consume.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Later; I have not the time now.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I can not until I get through. I will be glad to do so later.

THE SOLDIER HAD NO CHOICE.

Congress took the American soldiers from their families, their jobs, and from schools, pushed them into camps and then to the front to be shot at while drawing the munificent sum of $1 a day, three-fourths of which generally went for allotments and insurance. The soldier had no choice, because he was conscripted and sent through mud, mire, and hell-fire to fight for those who stayed at home. Others took his old job back home, receiving increased wages, and when he came back to a grateful country he found his job gone in many cases and the cheering crowds that thronged the streets of New York in 1918 had vanished back into countinghouses and banks in two short years. Over 500,000 of these soldiers, we are told, who helped make the world safe for democracy are now out of employment, vainly looking for jobs, many are on the streets of New York and Washington and all over the country, yet Wall Street journals and great financiers denounce Congress for seeing anything outside of a group of big business interests on Manhattan Island.

There are men who honestly ask why any bonus should be granted and who wonder why all our allies have granted extra pay to their own soldiers, but the most active protestants today are those who sat safely in swivel chairs and profited by that war and also officers, generally stationed far in the rear, who received many times the doughboys' pay yet found their old jobs waiting their return. Scratch the bonus critic and ordinarily he was among the shouters before the war of "go on boys," but now he puts an extra safety pin over his full pocketbook to prevent its being pried open by a generous impulse. Agricultural organizations throughout the country and labor generally oppose any sales tax but approve the bonus bill, but those most benefited by the sacrifices of American soldiers—war profiteers—are opposed.

REFERENDUMS THAT MEAN LITTLE.

Referendums received from chambers of commerce of the country oppose any soldiers' bonus. The directors of the chambers of commerce constantly conduct half-baked referendums. Every subject from taxes to rheumatism is now referendumed back to its members for our legislative action. Not one chamber in a dozen offers anything constructive on the subject, but Congress is referendumed on everything. The chamber of commerce appointed a committee of tax experts two years ago to tell Congress how to raise revenues. This tax committee reported unanimously against a general sales tax. Commerce members were immediately referendumed, and the sales tax was rejected by a country-wide vote. Again the directors referendumed members to secure an opposite verdict, and the chambers on a second referendum did as directed.

This commerce body now tells Congress no soldiers' bonus should be granted. Recently many States held official referendums at regular elections, and by overwhelming votes in every case urged compensation for the soldier. Those State referendums voluntarily taxed nine out of every ten to benefit the tenth man, and reflected public sentiment more accurately than any prejudiced referendum of commerce bodies.

A legitimate field exists for chambers of commerce and business bodies, and many high-class men are among that membership, but Judge Rummy referendums are of little value to intelligent legislation for self-evident reasons, and not one Congressman in a dozen is influenced by ill-considered referendums we regularly receive. The right of petition and protest exists with all bodies, although unintelligent action, based on prejudiced propaganda, is not the voice of the people from whom we derive our certificates of representation, and their referendum has been expressed in favor of a bonus.

Let me say I understand that practically every ex-service man in the House is for this bill. Possibly ex-service men holding positions as high as majors, who were on the Army staff located in the city of Washington, may oppose it. I understand they have opposed it on the floor of the House. But the men who were over there fighting, some of them from your membership here, practically every one of them is for this bill.

THE PEOPLE WHO SACRIFICED.

We know that the vast wealth and power of the world centered in a great city or a few men of wealth of the country do not speak the heart of the Nation when they denounce a soldiers' bonus bill and abuse those who propose its enactment. Great press agencies of the land, that obey the master's voice of selfishness and greed, do not represent the voice of the people when they distort, misrepresent, and malign the Congress, the soldiers' bill, and even men who stand sadly and silently awaiting congressional action.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. ARENTZ. I know that the gentleman does not want to make a mistake about our colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER]——

Mr. FREAR. I did not mention the gentleman from California. Let me correct the gentleman's misapprehension. Mr. LINEBERGER I hear has a fine record.

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes; I want to say that he has a splendid record.

Mr. FREAR. Yes. It was the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], whom the RECORD quotes as opposed to what he terms "bunk" and "sob stuff," who has criticized the committee and the bonus bill on the floor. I understand he had some position at Washington during the war, and without criticism I submit that a man drawing $7,500 a year now in Washington is hardly prepared to stand in the shoes of the 500,000 boys who are out of jobs.

May I add in answer to an unjust column editorial in a New York paper that my only son served with the Thirty-second Division at Château-Thierry and has since received from others several times any possible bonus to meet after war needs. Hundreds of thousands of others have had no one to lean upon. My own father, still living, served three and one-half years in the Union Army. A great-grandfather was killed in the Revolution. Modestly I add that I enlisted and served five years in the Regular Army and 11 years more in the Wisconsin National Guard, retiring with rank of colonel, during which period I raised a company for the Spanish American War, which was tendered to Governor Schofield, and yet I voted against the last war in company with General SHERWOOD, who was raised from a private to general, due to repeated gallantry in battles. Once war started I voted, without question, over $30,000,000,000 to win the war, and will now vote a billion or more of foreign debts—that Wall Street would cancel—for some slight measure of justice to those who won the war for the rest of us.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. I want to state to the gentleman that Wall Street does not represent the sentiment of the people of New York State. There are 10,000,000 of us, and we are good folks, and most of us are for the bonus.

Mr. FREAR. Yes. I am sure of it. No people could have made a better record than your assembly did yesterday in passing the $45,000,000 State bonus bill unanimously. It was the voice of New York State and not of the group of business men who continually denounce Congress and the bill.

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes. The first bonus bill passed by this House was a good bill, and if it had been enacted into law in the other body as it was passed in the House the trouble would all have been ended.

Mr. FREAR. That is just the point. New York City and the financiers there do not represent the heart of the people of this great country. I walked down past the employment agency on Pennsylvania Avenue a day or two ago. I suggest that gentlemen of the House walk down there to-morrow morning and see the white boys and the colored boys who were in former Army service now standing in line, waiting for jobs. Contrast that exhibition with multimillionaires opposed to this bill, insisting that it ought not to be passed!

As spake Anthony to Brutus and to other cold-blooded noble Roman icebergs, "Gentlemen all—alas," and of the human sacrifice, "Yesterday his acts might have stood against the would; now, none so poor to do him reverence."

Far out over the land, hundreds and thousands of miles away, a people lives, back in the forests of the North and in the high mountains of the West, in the fields of the South, and in the congested homes of Mulberry and Sullivan Streets—these people offered their boys for their country's cause when the call came. Every mother gave more than all the wealth of Manhattan itself when she sent her boy to war.

In the trenches, in the field, in the air their boys met the picked soldiery of the world and carried our flag again and again to victory. They recovered the lost fields of France; they revived the courage of the Allies; they won for posterity a fight that had been lost, and they saved for humanity the ideals of a liberty-loving people. The world sung their praises during those hours of conflict and victory; the great American heart back in the forests, fields, mountains, and Mulberry Street sings their praise to-day. No country can repay the sacrifices of war; no power can compensate for war losses; but speaking for those we represent, for the millions who are the hope and foundation of our Government, we offer the boys who returned the thanks of a grateful Nation, the blessings of a rescued world, and recognition that means more than empty words, because it carries with every dollar the prayers and hopes of the American people that the war to end all wars, which they won, was not won in vain. [Applause.]

The following letter to Secretary Mellon is self-explanatory:

MARCH 13, 1922.

Hon. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary United States Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Your letter on the soldiers' bonus addressed to Chairman FORDNEY, given wide publicity, is one of a number of letters and interviews in the press from your department that heretofore have gone unanswered. Without assuming to speak for Mr. FORDNEY or for the committee, but, rather, to voice a protest against criticisms by yourself, Crissinger, and other high officials against the committee, against Congress, and against a soldiers' bonus, may I be pardoned for this brief letter?

Congress has constitutional rights and responsibilities that can not properly be assumed by others nor avoided by those selected by the people for legislative duties; that should be conceded. Congress took from their homes, jobs, and schools 4,500,000 men and boys and sent them to war to fight for the rest of us at $1 a day, most of which munificent sum went for allotments and insurance. Over 500,000 of these men and boys are now reported to be without jobs, and some of them were standing this morning before the public employment office on Pennsylvania Avenue within one block of the Treasury Building.

During the war Treasury records are said to show that millionaires who stayed at home doubled in number and that fortunes were made by many thousands of others. These facts confront Congress, and we know that you have repeatedly and publicly expressed your opposition to any soldiers' bonus legislation. You have, further, said that no bonus should be paid except through taxes and you reiterate that in your letter to-day. You have objected before the committee to any inheritance and gift taxes or the reenactment of the excess-profits tax. You have suggested taxes to which we finally tentatively agreed, only to be advised that the President, whom you see frequently, would veto a bill if accompanied by such taxes.

You objected before the committee to paying the bonus by Treasury certificates, as authorized by law, and as the Treasury did when paying $3,000,000,000 of canceled war contracts, to which, we were advised, you never objected. The recent bill to stabilize railway securities, appropriating $500,000,000, passed by the House was with the approval of your department. You have objected before the committee to paying any soldiers' bonus out of foreign debts, which the soldiers helped to save for us. In fact, many icicles of sympathy and freezing advice are handed out that are in harmony with the last protest against "frozen credits." These hypothecated credits would probably never reach 1 per cent of all the loans held by the banks and trust companies combined, nor will they freeze soldiers half as much as the cold reception accorded them in many quarters. The figures you present are not admitted to be correct either in fact or effect.

You have left Congress but one alternative—enactment of a general sales tax. This tax repeatedly has been defeated by Congress during the Sixty-seventh session. This tax you admit will require thousands of new employees and also presents many difficulties of administration. If adopted, it will eventually shift $1,000,000,000 or more in income taxes now paid by the wealth of the country over to the shoulders of the consumers of the land.

For illustration, Mr. Secretary, Henry K. Klien (p. 155), in his recent work, rates your wealth at $300,000,000. Assuming that one-tenth of that amount is nearer right, then your annual income tax paid to the Treasury is probably over a million dollars, and this amount is believed to be approximately the income tax paid by two publishers of Washington papers which carry frequent sales-tax editorials—one in this morning's issue.

It is proposed in many quarters eventually to relieve income taxes by a sales tax, if that tax can be fastened to a soldiers' bill. It is conceded it can not be passed in any other way. By a coincidence many men with large wealth favor a sales tax, and I say this without criticism, because all men dislike to pay taxes. The fundamental principle of taxing according to ability to pay, however, can not be ignored, based on the testimony of every disinterested tax expert. All national, agricultural, and labor organizations are on record opposed to this tax. A similar sales tax helped turn the last Canadian Parliament, and its enactment would in like manner create many changes in the present Congress.

A sales tax has never been adopted in this country in time of peace, nor has any bill ever before passed Congress that was requested to create its own means of payment, as you insist shall be done with the soldiers' bonus bill. In short, Mr. Secretary, Members of Congress charged with official responsibilities are seeking to perform their constitutional duties, and if we fail to do so the people and not the Treasury Department will pass judgment on the record. I do not venture to criticize any department of the Government in offering its advice, but respectfully say that it is time we try to find some common ground if Congress submits its action for Treasury approval.

In conclusion, the bonus bill will be reported with little opposition, and will pass the House 5 to 1, according to indications. It will, we are advised, pass the Senate, not because of political fear as attributed in some quarters but because it is based upon absolute justice and right.

Very sincerely, JAMES A. FREAR.

The bill was reported by a vote of 19 to 5 and passed the House 10 days later by a vote of 333 to 70—a verification of the letter's prediction concerning House action.

In reply to my letter to Secretary Mellon I received a telephone call a few minutes ago, just before taking the floor, to speak for the bonus bill. Secretary Mellon said he had written me a letter in reply to mine of the 13th instant, and asked if I had any objections to its being given to the press, to which I replied I was perfectly willing anything he might write should be given publicity. His letter received is equally remarkable for its errors of commission and items of omission in its answer to my letter of March 13. It is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, March 17, 1922.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I received your letter of March 13, 1922, with respect to the soldiers' bonus. At the request of the Committee on Ways and Means I have addressed two letters to the chairman of the committee under date of January 24 and March 11, 1922, in order to show the state of the Treasury, with particular reference to the receipts and expenditures of the Government for this and the next fiscal year, and the refunding operations that will have to be carried on within the same period, and in that connection have indicated the Treasury's views as to the cost of a soldiers' bonus and its financial consequences. My position in the matter is fully stated in those letters, and, as you will have noticed, I have not attempted in them to argue the merits of the soldiers' bonus. Whether or not there is to be a soldiers' bonus is a question for which, as you say, Congress will assume responsibility. For the Treasury I have attempted to point out the necessity of meeting by taxation the cost of whatever bonus may be adopted and the dangers of attempting to provide for a bonus by borrowing or by makeshift measures. As I think was made clear to the committee and the country, I have not recommended any particular taxes, though I have, at the request of the committee, suggested several possible sources of additional revenue that would be available if Congress should decide to grant a soldiers' bonus, and in that connection have given the Treasury's estimates as to the yield of such additional taxes.

I gather from your letter that you are under some misapprehension also as to the Treasury's position with respect to a sales tax. The Treasury has not recommended any general sales tax. As a matter of fact, I am not in favor of a general sales tax if it is to be imposed in addition to all existing taxes, unless made necessary by an emergency in the revenue, such as would arise through adoption of the bonus measure.

Neither the payments which the Government has made in order to settle canceled war contracts nor the so-called railroad funding bill to which you refer present situations in any way analogous to the soldiers' bonus. In the first place, the Government did not pay, as you suggest, "$3,000,000,000 of canceled war contracts": but, on the contrary, settled war contracts amounting to over $3,700,000,000 at a total cost of about $503,000,000. In this connection I invite your attention to the following extract from a letter recently received from the Acting Secretary of War:

"The total obligations of the War Department on uncompleted contracts which were suspended shortly after the armistice, which have been settled, amounted to $3,701,643,800.35. The total number of claims filed with the War Department was 32,986. The total number of claims settled as of January 1, 1922, was 26,216. Relief was denied in 3,203 cases and 3,520 claims were withdrawn. The total amount paid out by the War Department in settlement of the uncompleted portion of all war contracts to January 1, 1922, was $503,546,764.62, which represents a settlement for 13 cents on the dollar.

"The act of March 2, 1919, expressly provided that in the settlement of informal contracts the award by the Secretary of War should not 'include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States, and a reasonable remuneration for expenditures made or obligations and liabilities necessarily incurred in performing or preparing to perform such contract.' In the adjustment of informal contracts prospective or possible profits were, therefore, necessarily disallowed.

"Many of the contracts executed in the manner required by law, particularly those entered into during the last half of 1918, contained termination clauses which provided that in the event of termination before completion the United States would reimburse the contractor for the delivered portion of the contract at the price stipulated in the contract and would make reimbursement for the suspended portion of the contract on the basis of actual cost of direct and indirect material, work in process, labor, and pro rata overhead, plus 10 per cent thereon, the 10 per cent being a remuneration for expenses and services of the contractor in connection with the uncompleted portion of the contract.

"The formal contracts which did not contain the termination clause and which were suspended after the armistice were settled on the same basis as if they had contained the termination clause referred to above."

From this it appears that the payments which were actually made on account of canceled war contracts represented, for the most part, reimbursement to contractors for actual expenditures incurred in reliance upon war contracts. The so-called railroad funding bill has never become a law, and, in any event, would not have appropriated any money out of the Treasury. Its purpose was simply to finance settlements of Government obligations arising out of Federal control through the sale of railroad securities already owned by the Government, and it has since become unnecessary with the change in market conditions which has made it possible to dispose of these railroad securities at par and accrued interest through the investment markets.

Very truly, yours,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

To Secretary Mellon's letter I immediately wrote a reply, which is also inserted herewith:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1922.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have your letter of to-day relating to the soldiers' bonus bill and thank you for the same. Let me correct what are unintentional errors, I am sure, and as the preceding letter contained a manifest error of $167,000,000,000, admitted to our committee, although given wide publicity, I feel that even belated corrections will be accepted with a purpose of preserving a correct record.

Your letter states first: "At the request of the Committee on Ways and Means I have addressed two letters to the chairman of the committee, under date of January 24 and March 11, 1922, etc." On page 29 of hearings of March 14 appears letter dated March 8, signed by the clerk of the committee, transmitting copies of the soldiers' bonus bill. The letter is as follows:

MARCH 8, 1922.

Hon. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In the absence of the chairman I acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 7, which was delivered by messenger yesterday after the chairman had left town.

I shall be glad to bring your letter to Mr. FORDNEY'S attention immediately on his return to Washington, and particularly that portion with reference to newspaper accounts which have purported to quote you.

For your information there is inclosed herewith several copies of H. R. 10769, which is a bill "To provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes."

Such comment as you may care to make thereon, addressed to the chairman, will be appreciated.

Very truly, yours, CLAYTON F. MOORE, Clerk.

The above letter contained no request from the Ways and Means Committee or from any member of the committee, and it was stated in committee session that no member of the committee had requested any letter from your department. The committee clerk, in the absence of the chairman, said on his own responsibility such comment as you desired to make would be appreciated, which was undoubtedly true, although he could not speak for the committee or chairman, of course. The 24-page letter given to the press by you on the opportunity afforded by the Clerk's letter starts out as follows:

"THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
"Washington, March 11, 1922.

"DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I received the letter of March 8, 1922, with the inclosed copies of H. R. 10769 from the Committee on Ways and Means, and, in accordance with the suggestion that the committee would be glad to have the Treasury's comment thereon, have examined the proposed bill to provide for a soldiers' bonus or so-called adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War."

I do not believe you were in any way responsible for the voluntary letter, for the error as to its request by the committee, or for the unusual proceeding in handing it to the press, where it was given two or three columns of valuable space, whereas the average expression of men at our end of the Avenue is afforded a scant dozen lines, which is presumably a fair measure of the difference in value according to news standards.

Startling headlines confronted the public the next morning that the bonus would cost the Government $185,625,000,000, as follows:

"Land settlement cash base, $1,495,000,000; possible cost to Government, $185,625,000,000. Cash bonus base as 8 per cent of total cost."

The slight error of $167,000,000,000 in possibilities and of $185,000,000,000 in all human probability is apparent to anyone familiar with the facts. I do not desire to burden you with other corrections brought out in the hearing, where the evident intention of the writer of the letter was to discredit in every way the bonus proposal. The committee absolved you of any such purpose or of any exact knowledge of matters of detail necessarily prepared by others.

In my letter of March 13 I said you have left Congress but one alternative—enactment of a general sales tax. To this you reply: "The Treasury has not recommended any general sales tax." I do not desire to misconstrue or misquote, but submit the following from page 6 of committee hearings:

"Mr. FREAR. May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman—and let me say, in all fairness to the witness and myself, that I was not one of those who voted to have the Secretary here, not but what we are very glad to have him. There is only one line of questioning I have to offer. What method would you propose, if any, for financing the bonus bill, if it is enacted into law? Before answering that question, let me ask you this question: Is it not true that you have opposed in the record which I have here any increased tax on inheritances or on gifts and opposed the reenactment of the excess-profits tax?

"Secretary MELLON. Yes.

"Mr. FREAR. Opposed the issuance of certificates based upon foreign debts; in fact, everything we have presented, except where you submitted some special taxes which, when embodied in a bill, the President said he would veto; or, at least, that is the information brought to us. Now, is that the situation as you understand it, Mr. Secretary?

"Secretary MELLON. The answer to that is that the objection to the taxes which are now in existence is that they are as burdensome now as the country should be asked to bear. Now, for the purpose of the bonus or for providing revenue, there should be a diffusion of that burden. It should be spread over a large class of objects or commodities, if there is a tax of that nature required.

"Mr. FREAR. What kind of tax would that be?

"Secretary MELLON. That would be in the nature of a sales tax, but not a general sales tax.

"Mr. FREAR. On specific articles?

"Secretary MELLON. It would not be necessary to impose a general sales tax, but just a tax on a broad class of commodities, where the percentage would be small on each one and the effect would not be burdensome.

"Mr. FREAR. Is that the tax proposed in Canada or adopted there? Is that the suggestion you have, or what kind of sales tax have you in mind?

"Secretary MELLON. To some extent the Canadian tax is of that nature.

"Mr. FREAR. That is the only tax you have in mind or the only means of raising revenue to finance the bonus bill, of which you would be in favor?

"Secretary MELLON. There were other suggestions, such as to increase the tax on first-class postage, and to increase the tobacco tax, etc.

"Mr. FREAR. But the President, we understood, would veto any bill that proposed taxes along the line of postage and gasoline taxes and others you recommended, so that, of course, those would be eliminated, if we follow the suggestions that have been given to us about having the bill passed and secure the signature of the President. Now, are we left only to the sales tax; is that your understanding?

"Secretary MELLON. Not necessarily to a general sales tax."

Your statement that I said over $3,000,000,000 in canceled war contracts were paid, is noted, and I accept without question your correction that $3,700,000,000 in claims were settled for $503,000,000, and I congratulate the officials who reduced $3,700,000,000 in claims to a half billion dollars. But when authority was given the Treasury Department to settle and pay over three and a half billion dollars in claims of men who were not wounded, maimed, blind, or otherwise physically disabled, the Treasury Department did not demand that the bill should contain special taxes to pay the three and a half billion dollars which were finally shaved down to a half billion dollars, in round numbers. In other words, without knowledge of what reduction would be made, my point is that the Treasury Department never demanded that a "possible" $3,700,000,000 claim, to use Treasury terms, should finance itself whereas you now insist that a soldiers' bonus bill that will not take any amount to embarrass the Treasury within three years—not 10 per cent or not 5 per cent of these former war claims—should be so financed.

My own contention, Mr. Secretary, is that foreign bonds, when received, should be used for that purpose, and that $200,000,000 annual interest on British bonds of $4,500,000,000 would pay the entire bonus for 20 years without imposing one dollar of taxes. The soldiers who gave these bonds some value by winning the war have a fair lien on them.

I note next you say "the so-called railway refunding bill has not become law, and in any event would not have taken any money out of the Treasury."

My letter read: "The recent bill to stabilize railway securities, appropriating $500,000,000, passed by the House, was with the approval of your department." The bill was to permit the purchase of railway securities, if I remember correctly, and the House, as I stated, passed the measure. Whether it became law or not was not due to Treasury opposition but to Senate inaction, with malice aforethought we learn. Where the money was to come from I can not say without the bill, but it is correct, I believe, to say that in all the billions of dollars heretofore appropriated and all authorizations heretofore made by Congress, in no single case before has the Treasury Department had hitched to the bill any separate financing scheme.

In conclusion, Mr. Secretary, let me say I do not question the full right and duty of your department to protect to the utmost the Treasury from ill-considered legislation. My own protest is against methods pursued and in what appears to be making fish of railway, shipping, and other war contracts and fowl of the bill for the relief of ex-service men.

Permit me to express personally the consideration which is extended to you by every member of our committee for your ability and purpose. All we ask is equal consideration, which I am certain will be extended, so far as you are personally concerned.

Sincerely, yours,

JAMES A. FREAR.

The following letter from a Treasury employee, one of many received from ex-soldiers, is self-explanatory:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 14, 1922.

Representative FREAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am, indeed, pleased to note the fact that we still have a few true-blooded Americans at the head of our Government. The reason for this statement is because of the fact that you have the nerve to buck the moneyed powers that are trying to ruin this fair Nation of ours. * * * The crowd that Mr. Mellon belongs to will be doomed if our Senators and Representatives will decide which is the better, a choice few or the people.

I am fully convinced that Mellon is determined to have his way about all affairs, his own as well as those affecting others. You are positively correct in your stand on the bonus question, and the bill should become a law now and not after we boys are dead. Mellon, many times a millionaire, does not care what becomes of others, or their rights, either. I am surprised at Mr. Harding. * * * The administration should lose sight of the soldier in olive drab and note the same man as a citizen doing his official duties as if the war never happened. We are voters now and free to think and act. I again thank you for your true stand for our right.

Yours, truly, ——— ———.

P. S.—I have had three years' military service, 18 months overseas, belong to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and voice the sentiment of the best service men; also am a * * * and only took two weeks' vacation in May, 1919, after my discharge, which proves the fact that the service man wanted to work if any was to be had. I will appreciate a home benefit most gladly, as I had to pay a war patriot 16 per cent interest on a loan against my home in Virginia, made necessary by my father's illness during my enlistment. This I had to pay when discharged, while he enjoyed many fine chances to make good money, as Mr. Mellon and thousands of others. I soldiered with the Thirty-second Wisconsin troops, and never met a finer type of men in all my experience, and am glad that you are one of the same kind. * * *

——— ———.

My own son served with the Thirty-second on the Marne.

Apart from misrepresentation by powerful newspapers and equally powerful financiers, the dishonest and reprehensible methods used to influence the President and Congress may be gathered from the following:

The American Legion Weekly prints an affidavit showing graphically how "sentiment" is being worked up throughout the country. The Legion Weekly prints the following statement of an ex-service man who was employed by a New York financial institution:

"For two and one-half years I have been employed by ———, Exchange Place, New York City, dealers in stocks, members of the New York Stock Exchange.

"On Wednesday, February 8, 1922, at about 4.45 p. m., the head of the department in which I was employed requested that each employee write four letters in opposition to the adjusted compensation now pending in Congress. He requested that one letter be addressed to President Harding, one to each of the United States Senators of the State in which the employee lived, and one to the Representative of the congressional district in which the employee lived. A typewritten form of the letter he desired written was passed around among the employees. This typewritten form letter was on ordinary bond paper and not on the firm's letterhead, as most other memoranda usually were. The name of the firm did not appear on the form letter. The same action, I learned later, was taken in the other departments of ———.

"Each employee was advised to write the four letters and to hand them in on the following morning to the department heads. Each employee was told to leave his letters, unsealed, as the firm would seal them, put stamps on them, and mail them. For the convenience of employees it was announced the firm would look up the names of the Senators and Representatives of their respective districts.

"I heard one of the department heads remark while employees were discussing the instructions, 'You fellows had better write these letters to-night if you want to keep your jobs.' Naturally, after these orders were given out, there was a lot of comment and many arguments among the employees, and from expressions I believe that fully 60 per cent considered it was unjust and unfair to ask them to write any such letters in the way it had been done. They considered they had been deprived of their rights, as they realized that if the firm's wishes were not complied with they would be discharged, if not immediately, at the first trivial offense they committed. Despite their feelings, however, most of them figured they could not afford to disobey the implied command. Many of them were married and felt that it would be hopeless to try to refuse to write the letters under the circumstances.

"Out of approximately 250 employees 3 did not write the four letters requested of them. I am one of the 3." * * *

This man was let out at once, he says.

KAHN WOULD CANCEL DEBTS—EUROPE'S PLEDGE TO END TURMOIL ENOUGH IN RETURN, SAYS BANKER.

NEW YORK, March 15.

Cancellation of the allied war debts to the United States in return for pledges that conditions keeping Europe in turmoil will be eliminated, was advocated to-day by Otto H. Kahn, banker, in a speech before the Advertising Club. The disturbing conditions referred to have grown out of the various peace treaties and form the basis for interminable strife, he said.

"The most troublesome of many ills growing out of the treaties is the amount of the German reparation," he added. "It is not only greatly beyond Germany's capacity to pay but it is causing grave damage to all the world. A policy of audacious kindliness in dealing with foreign problems is necessary if prosperity is to return to this country."

BARNES'S BONUS BILL PASSED—ENABLES NEW YORK STATE TO BORROW $45,000,000 TO PAY EX-SOLDIERS.

ALBANY, N. Y., March 15.

By unanimous vote the assembly late to-day adopted the Barnes bill proposing an amendment to the constitution to empower the legislature to borrow not to exceed $45,000,000 for the payment by the State of bonuses to residents of the State who served in the World War.

The moneys would be raised by a bond issue.

SOLDIERS' BONUS.

(By Joseph D. Miller.)

A few weeks ago all America paid homage to the unknown soldier. From the Nation's highest to the lowest we bowed in reverence to those who sailed the sea to battle for the cause of world liberty, and who in that cause fought and fell.

Almost at the same moment the body of Albert Miller lay unclaimed in the Buffalo morgue. Friendless, jobless, emaciated from lack of food, Miller had died in a squalid rooming house. With unconscious irony the medical examiner said he had died of "natural causes." Is it, indeed, "natural" for men to die in this way? Is it not because we have set at naught all natural laws that should govern society? * * * He found none to employ him and no opportunity to employ himself.

FOUGHT FOR HIS COUNTRY.

* * * Bravely, indeed, had he fought. As a dispatch rider, a particularly hazardous service, he had brought the news of the armistice to British general headquarters. He was the first man to carry the news to the men in the line that the war was ended. He wore the British distinguished service medal and he had been decorated for gallantry at Vimy Ridge. And the end of it all was an oak slab in the dimly lighted morgue, his soul fled from the poor starved body ticketed with a small tag marked "unclaimed."

Look, you, lords of the land, lawmakers, you can not remedy the injustice done to this brave soldier dying at 25, an age when to most of us life is just beginning. He has passed where you can do him neither good nor ill. He was told that he fought to keep the German hordes from laying waste our cities when they were through with France and England. He was asked to fight to keep them away from your perhaps more tenderly reared sisters and wives and daughters. And he took you at your word. And this is the reward you have meted out to him.

But Alfred Miller is only a type. There are hundreds of thousands like him. We owe them a great debt. We should pay it, in so far as we may, if we have any self-respect. * * *

At the risk of trespassing on the right to print, I add to my remarks a letter appearing in the New York Times of March 12. It contains more human interest, more eloquent appeal, more well-grounded protest, and more hard facts than any statement I have ever seen from any soldier. I do not know the man who wrote, nor do I expect he will ever learn his contribution found a place in the RECORD, but I challenge any Senator or any Representative to make appeal to his fellows that will be more effective. We are frequently charged with being a cold-blooded race bound up in the almighty dollar, our own political or personal fortunes, or in purely selfish interests. The citizen soldier of to-day at the door or standing on the street corner without medals, chevrons, or any gleam of pride or hope, is the same man whom we patted on the back and shouted "We will take care of you when you come back. Give 'em h—l and remember our prayers are with you." Did we mean it? Have we done it? What a contemptible feeling if we do feel and understand to know that we were safe at home enjoying comforts and ease when this man and hundreds of thousands of his comrades were at the front fighting for us, and yet we begrudge him the small bonus carried in this bill. I ask that his letter be read. It contains an unanswerable appeal for the soldier bonus bill:

AN APPEAL TO MELT "FROZEN CREDIT" ICICLES.

To the editor of the New York Times:

I was one of the 50,000 men who reached France in June and July, 1917, while the 95 per cent mentioned by the contributor of "the bonus and the fighting man" were holding on to the jobs they had and gambling on the draft getting them—the language is that of the same contributor. It is not pertinent to this discussion that I was overseas nearly two years without receiving any medals and returned home in good health, except for a knee that twinges in damp weather, several teeth that are in bad shape due to hurried treatment by Army dentists, and a stomach that refuses to function properly at intervals. With thousands of others, I volunteered as soon as possible after war was declared. I went, and they went, not because we had to, but because we wanted to do our full duty to our country. When we enlisted news of the draft act had not yet reached the first pages of the newspapers. The declaration of war was our only summons. Perhaps it is egotistical to mention the Minute Men of Lexington, the volunteers who manned Perry's ships in Lake Erie, the boys who risked fever and Spanish bullets in Cuba, and say that like them we needed no other summons.

I recall in those early days we realized what was ahead of us and did not look forward to France with unalloyed pleasure. Yet we did want passionately to be among the first Americans to reach that country; probably the boys to jump to answer Lincoln's call in 1861 had the same feeling. We were not the scum of the cities or the loafers of the small towns or the ne'er-do-wells of the farms, who were glad to have an opportunity to place the responsibility of providing food and lodging in the hands of Uncle Sam. In my company, with which, of course, I am most familiar, all but three or four were native-born Americans, fully half were college or university students or graduates, all of the others had left good positions or jobs, 20 or more coming from industrial plants paying fancy wages for the manufacture of shells or explosives. A considerable percentage were under 21 years of age, a smaller number were over 35. The other day, while reading the roster of men from my county who enlisted for the War of 1812 and the Mexican and Civil Wars, I noticed the similarity in names—I could have been reading my own regimental roster. I say this without one thought of disparaging our foreign-born Americans, who wrote the story of their patriotism in blood at Chateau-Thierry and in the Argonne Forest. Many of the men in my company never would have had to go—they were above the draft age, or below it, or engaged in the so-called essential industries. When I walked into the recruiting station to enlist as a private for the duration, I carried in my pocket an important looking document authorizing me to attend an officers' training camp. I knew I could get to France before that course had fairly begun. Unlike the writer of the article mentioned above, the pride we feel always can be at flood tide, for what service we were able to give we gave cheerfully and ungrudgingly.

To-day I can not, with honor, shut my eyes to the needs and aspirations of the men who were with me in France, who joked and toiled their way through the grim winter of 1917 with summer underwear, Canadian overcoats, sometimes with but one pair of socks and never more than three, sleeping at times in unfinished, unheated barracks, without even a candle for light, with gloves that did not last through a day's hike or a night's work. I suppose the man who sold them to the Government is opposed to the bonus. I remember one boy who struggled through a case of pneumonia lying on a wooden bunk in cold barracks. There was no other place to send him. I can not shut my eyes to the present needs of the fellows who went through that bitter mess over there with courage and what cheerfulness they could muster, telling themselves how good it would be to be back on their jobs in America, doing a day's work, then going home to dinner. At the same time their families were skimping to buy Liberty bonds—and it is not the returned soldiers who bought them during the depression at 85 and are holding them for a raise—and contribute to the Red Cross, and writing such cheerful letters that the soldiers never learned of profiteers, shipyard workers, and pretty officers with spurs in Washington offices until they returned home. Things would be all right, we hoped, when we returned home.

Things were all right for a while. True, we found John Doe, who had been working in a munitions factory, riding around in a big automobile and wearing silk shirts. We found foodstuffs high and rent still higher. The $60 tossed like a crust to us when we were discharged hardly paid for our new civilian outfit. But we found jobs that enabled us to earn enough to get along, eat regularly, and keep a roof over our heads, even if we could not lay anything aside for the proverbial rainy day. How quickly that rainy day came. Mills closed, in many cases using the system that the last hired must be the first to leave; soldiers who had been given jobs after the war were dropped and men who had stayed at home to work in essential industries were retained. Soldiers who had come back home to reopen their little stores or garages or manufactory found first that they could get orders and no money and later that they could get neither orders, money, nor credit. Clerks, draftsmen, engineers, laborers, surveyors, stenographers, all former soldiers, trained and untrained men, but all with the will and desire to work, not only found themselves without jobs but without a chance to find jobs. True, other men who had not been in the Army or Navy found themselves out of work, but in many cases these men had earned big wages during the war, and if they had not been unduly extravagant had tidy sums in banks to tide them over the period of depression. We who had been two years in France had had no opportunity to save.

As I write to-night, I see on my desk the names of 12 or more men of ability and training, all veterans with overseas service, who had come to me in the last week or two to enlist my help in finding a job. Proud as they were, independent as they were, they were reduced to practically begging for an opportunity to earn enough to keep them alive, having come to the end of their resources after weeks of tramping the streets from office to factory. Some of them have wives and children. One who was here a few minutes ago is an accomplished mechanic and can not even find a job as janitor or digging ditches. Can I with honor desert these men? And is it any wonder that while the pride we feel in our service to Uncle Sam can be at flood it rarely bubbles over into words? Does that sound bitter? Well, these men do not want charity; they want work. Is it possible to explain to certain members of the United States Chamber of Commerce, who damn the bonus while they sit in palatial homes built with war-time profits, that to-night, in the cold rain, men are walking the streets wondering where in God's name they will find a place to sleep, praying for a chance to earn enough to keep from starving, desperate at the thought of old mothers and fathers and hungry wives and kids? I realize these men ought to be used to hunger—they sometimes went hungry in France. I realize these men ought not to mind the rain—the rain was just as cold at Dun-sur-Meuse. I realize they should not worry about their loved ones, who struggled on without them while they were in France. But I declare there is something unjust in this situation, something wrong in a situation that enables those who were safe and comfortable during the war to be comfortable now and discriminate against those who bore the burden and brunt of the fighting, who lived anxious days and weary nights, and who now must learn still further lessons of hunger and privation.

There is something wrong, but, like my friend who signed himself one of the four million, I know too little of economics to point out the root of the trouble. Remember, these men are Americans who have proven their patriotism in a manner many of those mouthing opposition to the bonus can not even realize or imagine; the forefathers of many of these men fought to create the Nation and preserve the Union. True, they were reared under the protection of the American flag; but if they did not show sufficiently their appreciation and pay whatever debt that upbringing entailed in France, then surely their service has earned them the right to ask Uncle Sam to give them a chance to work, an opportunity to begin payments on homes or to use what little money they would receive from the bonus legislation to keep soul and body together until such time as jobs are more plentiful without being called "profiteers," "ne'er-do-wells" or "grafters." "There is a note of sadness in this bonus agitation," wrote the author of "The Bonus and the Fighting Man." True, and there is no sadder note than that sung by a man who can so far forget the men who fought shoulder to shoulder with him in France as to refer to them collectively as a "hold-up gang."

In the article which aroused the energy now being expended on my typewriter the author used some statistics, including a sentence to the effect that not 5 per cent of the former soldiers believe the bonus will do any permanent good, and that all but 5 per cent would squander it. Statistics are handy things for the writer, and there comes to my mind an old and profane adage that catalogues statistics as the superlative of lies. I know, and every reader knows, that the writer of that article has made no national effort to discover what the former service man thinks or will do, nor has Andrew W. Mellon made such an effort, nor the directors of the United States Chamber of Commerce, nor anyone else opposed to the bonus, not even our new Senator, GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER, who, possibly, has been too busy explaining his vote on the Newberry case to bother about any statistics.

I have before me the report made by a State official of the American Legion who toured my State, getting in touch with some 300,000 former soldiers. He found them almost a unit in favor of the bonus—I use the word the opponents of the measure are so fond of using—and incidentally reported that nearly 98 per cent intended to take the home aid or insurance provisions of the bill now before Congress. That was but one State. When a man says all but 5 per cent of the soldiers will squander the bonus, he first should read the bill and learn that under the systems provided for payment there will be little opportunity for squandering, and, second, should remember that the Army was but a cross section of American citizenship and that former soldiers will no more squander the bonus than will any other class of men or women. I know two or three veterans of the Civil War who, despite their age, are having a riotous time squadering their $75 a month. God knows, by the time some of these soldiers who are out of work pay grocery bills and coal bills and clothing bills and doctor bills and dentist bills the amount left for squandering will not provide sufficient ice cream to feed an Eskimo.

I admit the bonus will not enable the soldier to start his business career in a magnificent office, with mahogany furniture and a blond private secretary, but it will enable him to find his footing in these industrial everglades. The bill provides installments of $50. Do you smile at that sum? Monsieur Un de Quatre Mille—recognize that, Yank—have you ever "carried the banner" through city streets at night, with the collar of your last summer's suit turned up to keep out the rain? Have you ever wished to God there was an Army cook handy to ladle you a tin of greasy slum? Have you ever begged to be allowed to sleep in a lousy doss house? Have you ever had it driven home to you that there are no jobs to get, not though you tramp from place to place all day, interviewing foremen here and bosses there, plugging with all the courage and grit you displayed when you won your D. S. C. in France? If you have, you will know that $50 will keep a man's head above water for a long time, and that he won't squander a copper cent, but will pinch three times every nickel he spends for stale bread and bowls of stew.

You will appreciate the sentiment of the members of the American Legion in this city who feed and lodge every night about 200 men who spend their days looking for work, which even the Legion can not get for them. These men are anxious to find jobs—they are fighters from the word go. The citizens of America, especially those who have valuable property and are so anxious to hold on to everything they have, should thank God every night that practically all of these men are too honest to turn to beggary or crime even as a last resort. These men are inarticulate. We need such organizations as the Veterans of the Foreign Wars or the American Legion to tell their stories for them.

I am neither an economist nor a financier, so can not discuss intelligently the plans for raising the bonus funds that daily are mentioned and discarded in Washington. I am, I hope, blessed with an ordinary amount of common sense, and know that so astute a banker as Mr. Mellon can, if he so desires, devise a plan to raise the necessary funds, just as he undoubtedly would raise the money if it were needed in his private enterprises. Can it be true that the country that paid bonuses to shipyard workers and civilian employees in the camps, that donated gold like water to this foreign nation and that, that appropriates money here and money there, can not find sufficient for her own soldiers? It is to laugh! That is, if it were not so tragic, this picture of American boys, who gave some of the best years of their lives to the flag, tramping the streets, hungry, searching for work.

* * * I have read this over and I suppose it will sound bitter, coming from one who has a job and who is working as hard as he can to hold it and to advance a little, if possible. But I can not help thinking of the boys who are out of work, and, besides, will not consider myself either a ne'er-do-well or a grafter if, when the bonus bill finally is approved, I accept whatever provision appeals to me, for I must admit that during the war my bank account dwindled to next to nothing and I have not been able to increase it to a respectable figure since. The writer of "The bonus and the fighting man" ended his article with a threat against legislators who would vote for a bonus. I can not do that. Somewhere—perhaps in France—I learned to respect the rights of other men to opinions differing from my own, and take for granted that those opinions are honest until proved otherwise. I can conceive of myself voting gladly for a man who happened honestly to oppose the bonus, but who usually is in the right, as far as I am able to determine. But I can not conceive of myself or any soldier with straight thoughts and red blood doing otherwise than opposing with all the strength we have those who assail us with bitter names because we ask for the passage of a bill we honestly believe equitable, just, and honorable.

ONE OF THE FIFTY THOUSAND.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, namely:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How long does the gentleman from Kansas intend to run to-night?

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought we would read the first paragraph, and then I would move to rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The first paragraph has been read.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH, as Speaker pro tempore, having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MICHAELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bonus bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SOLDIERS' BONUS.

Mr. MICHAELSON. Mr. Speaker and Members of this House, does this Nation now owe anything to its defenders, its gallant soldiers and sailors who fought in the World War and of whom the Republican national convention said in its platform of 1920:

"We hold in imperishable remembrance the valor and patriotism of the soldiers and sailors of America who fought in the Great War for human liberty, and we pledge ourselves to discharge to the fullest the obligations which a grateful Nation justly should fulfill, in appreciation of the services rendered by its defenders on sea and on land."

Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that when this Government called these men for military service abroad, without giving them a voice and in violation of the foreign policy which we had pursued from the organization of the Government itself, it—the Government—incurred a most binding and sacred obligation to care, not only for the dependents of those who would have to make the supreme sacrifice and those who would be physically disabled, but it bound itself, morally at least, to take care of the financial loss sustained by those who went through that inferno unscathed.

Without perfidy and dishonor to itself, therefore, this Government can indulge in no quibbling as to the amount of the bonus, the manner in which it shall be paid, or the way in which the money to pay it shall be raised. Thousands of precious lives might have been saved, and untold suffering by the living avoided, if those in authority had performed their plain duty by giving this matter the right of way, over everything else, immediately after the signing of the armistice. But while those lives can not be recalled or the suffering by the living forgotten, other lives can be saved, and further suffering can be avoided if Congress will settle this question as it ought to be settled.

There is, of course, only one way to solve any problem, and that is the right way. And the only right way to solve this problem is:

First. To pay these men the difference between what they were earning in civil life when called to the colors and what the Government paid them while in its service. In other words, if a man were earning $100 per month in civil life when he was enrolled, and received $30 per month while in the service, he should be paid a bonus of $70 per month during the period of his enrollment.

Second. To pay each man in cash, money which is worth 100 cents on the dollar everywhere.

Third. To raise that cash by selling United States bonds, to be known as the soldiers' bonus liberty bonds, in precisely the same manner that we sold Liberty bonds to raise money to loan to France, and with which France has paid her soldiers a bonus of $249 apiece.

Such a bonus is just, because it is the best kind of an object lesson in patriotism to future generations, and because it will serve as the surest and best insurance policy against future wars that this Nation can have. Such a plan has been submitted to this Congress in H. R. 7569, introduced by myself on July 6, 1921, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Precedent has been amply established for such a bonus as this. Organized wealth, represented by the international bankers, the railroads, the profiteering munitions makers, shipbuilders, dealers in war material, food and supplies, have already collected all of their alleged war losses, and the public utility corporations throughout the land, aided and abetted by commercialized newspapers, have taken their pound of flesh, and few, if any, of the beneficiaries of these bonuses ever ventured outside the security of the safety zone.

Any further compensation allowed our soldiers and sailors, any bonus granted them should be worth 100 cents on each dollar thereof, anywhere and everywhere, because at this time and in this instance the soldier and the sailor, and they alone, should share in the benefit. Under the plan submitted to this House by the Ways and Means Committee many of the veterans in order to obtain ready money will have to submit to the extortion of the loan sharks by heavily discounting their bonus certificates.

Is it not ungenerous enough for the Government to compel the veteran to pay his share of his own bonus by taxation? Should we now add insult to injury by compelling the needy veteran to discount his bonus in order to obtain cash for it?

If the Government had done its full duty and conscripted, at the time it conscripted the boy, enough great wealth to support the boy, funds for a bonus would not now be so hard to find. But as the war profiteers, through commercialized newspapers, strangled that plan in its infancy, the fairest, safest, and quickest way to raise money for a bonus is through the sale of bonds.

Did we not sell bonds to raise the $10,000,000,000 which we loaned to our so-called allies, among which were Belgium, France, and England?

With a part of that money, has not Belgium paid its soldiers a bonus of $492?

With a part of that money, has not France paid its soldiers a bonus of $249?

With a part of that money, has not England also paid its soldiers a bonus of $190?

And were not many overseas American veterans, who are today in destitute circumstances, called upon to buy some of the bonds which were sold to raise money which was loaned to Belgium, France, and England, and a part of which has been used by those countries to pay their own soldiers a bonus?

Why, then, do not those endowed with the power to do so arrange to pay America's debt of honor as Americans should discharge an obligation of this sort?

Why do they not arrange to pay this debt in full by paying these men what the Nation really owes them, which is the difference between what they were paid and what they were earning when called for service?

Why do they not arrange to pay them in money which is worth 100 cents on the dollar wherever it may be tendered?

And why do they not arrange for raising the money with which to redeem this sacred pledge in an aboveboard manner by authorizing the sale of soldiers' bonus liberty bonds for that purpose?
